Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Carlisle—Settle Line

1. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with the chairman of British Rail the viability of the Carlisle to Settle railway line.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): It would not be appropriate in view of the application for closure.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it not a fact that 80 per cent. of the work that needs to be done is in employment and less than 20 per cent. in materials? What are the real costs, in view of the numbers that would then be employed? Does that not put the preservation of the Ribblehead and other viaducts in a different light?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman has drawn an interesting point to our attention. However, Ministers will have to consider the proposals for closure in a quasi-judicial capacity. It would be quite wrong today for me to give an indication of my view of the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Watson: I appreciate my hon. Friend's position, but is he aware that passenger traffic on that line, using the Settle and Skipton stations, has increased by about 400 per cent. in the 18 years since the line was first suggested for closure? Is my hon. Friend at all perplexed about the fact that a line then considered viable should now be considered uneconomic by British Rail, even though it now carries four times as many people?

Mr. Michell: Of course, that is one of the matters that we will inquire into. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a statutory duty to consider all relevant issues in reaching his decision.

Mr. Straw: Is the Minister aware that an integral part of the closure proposals for the Settle to Carlisle line is the closure of a section of line between Blackburn and Hellifield? Is he further aware that that has been a very popular route for Dalesrail passenger services, and that there is also a connection through to the Settle to Carlisle services? Although we all appreciate the Minister's quasi-judicial position, will he end this farce of an inquiry by saying that he will provide the money to keep those essential services going?

Mr. Mitchell: It is for the inquiry to report on hardship. When it has reported on that, Ministers will consider the reports on hardship and the British Rail closure proposals. We shall look searchingly into it to see whether it stands up financially, and will consider all the other aspects as well. The wider issues will be taken into account by Ministers. However, the inquiry is into hardship, and it would certainly be wrong to stop it.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the line's importance for tourist potential in north-west England and south-west Scotland, particularly with regard to the steam excursion train? Does not British Rail owe some duty to the nation to maintain such splendid viaducts?

Mr. Mitchell: The viaducts involve other matters, such as preservation orders, which are outside the scope of today's question. But of course we understand the tourist potential. I am very enthusiastic about the way in which steam railways can attract a lot of tourist trade. Ministers will have to consider such matters when we have the inquiry's report. However, enthusiastic as I may be about steam locomotion, it is, regretfully, not something that I shall express a view about before receiving the report and before the decision is made.

Mr. Stott: If my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis) had been in his place, I am sure that he would have asked the Minister a question, but unfortunately he is not here as he is ill. I fully understand the Secretary of State's quasi-judicial role. In connection with the question of the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson), is the Minister aware that I am advised that the line made a profit of about £1 million last year? We are talking, not about any old railway line, but about one of the most historic, scenic and beautiful lines in the world. I very much hope that the Minister and the Secretary of State will bear those points in mind when they make their decision. The nation is proud of that line and wants to keep it.

Mr. Mitchell: One must recognise that there is a difference between making an operating profit and making sufficient money to be able to maintain the structures in a fit and proper condition. The two are different. However, I must agree with the hon. Gentleman about the scenic nature of the route. I have travelled on it and have climbed all over the Ribblehead viaduct. I am keenly aware of the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, and, of course, they are ones, along with many others, that Ministers will take into account when they come to take their decision.

Tourist Signs

2. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to introduce more widely the new white and brown tourist attraction signs following the experiments in Kent and Nottinghamshire; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): The experiments were very successful. The system is to be introduced throughout England. Information is now being sent to local authorities and others. Signs to attractions with over 150,000 visitors a year will be allowed on motorways. On other roads there can be lower thresholds. The new scheme will benefit both tourists and attractions.

Mr. Knight: Representing as I do an area of great tourist potential I welcome that reply and my hon. Friend's Department should be congratulated on the speed with which it has dealt with the matter. What implication does his decision have for public expenditure? Who will pay for the new signs?

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The experiment was well carried out by the two counties and we are grateful to them. The Department has got on with this and that is generally welcomed. In general, the attraction operators will be paying for the signs. Local authorities can contribute, but we do not expect to see an increase in public expenditure.

Mr. Haynes: The signs are attractive, but where is the Department of Transport's priority? We can travel up the M1 and at junctions 27 and 28 there is no sign at all for Sutton in Ashfield and Kirkby in Ashfield in my constituency? Will the hon. Gentleman consider that matter.

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome and when I next travel up the motorway I shall see whether I can advertise his constituency and the robust way in which he represents it in the House.

Mr. Key: I welcome my hon. Friend's decision, but will he not go overboard on the standardisation of signs, which might be provided perfectly adequately by local businesses? Will he also note that people want to know about not just tourist sites but village shops in rural areas such as mine?

Mr. Bottomley: I am not sure that we want to advertise every village shop from motorways, but the important point is that we are allowing signs to be put up and paid for by attraction operators, so that both in boosting tourism and in deregulation we are to be congratulated.

Terminal 4, Heathrow

3. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the arrangements for security at the new terminal 4 at Heathrow.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I have personally spent a good deal of time on security arrangements at London Heathrow in general and terminal 4 in particular. There can never be 100 per cent. certainty about preventive measures and there will be a need for constant vigilance and, no doubt, future refinements. I am, however, satisfied with the attention given to this matter by the British Airports Authority at Heathrow terminal 4, which is one of the world's most advanced from a security point of view. Security measures at British airports have been further stepped up in the past few days.

Mr. Forth: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply and I am sure that we found it most reassuring, but he must be aware of the rather horrific stories that have been circulating recently about terminal 4 and the apparently easy access that some people have had to that terminal. Can he reassure the House that those stories will be taken seriously and will be investigated? What steps are being taken to examine baggage, both hand-held and destined for the cargo holds of aeroplanes, to ensure that there will be no repetition of certain disastrous events which have taken place in aircraft around the world?

Mr. Spicer: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that it is our firm aim to ensure that British airports are as secure in future as they have been in the past. Some of the stories that have arisen, as my hon. Friend has mentioned, have been misplaced. One particular newspaper claimed to have broken security when in fact the journalists had to go through security before they were able to take their pictures.

Mr. Cartwright: Is the Minister aware of reports that security staff at Heathrow are not happy with the operation of machinery, which apparently failed to detect the presence of explosives at the airport last week? What action is he taking on the view of the staff that the only effective method of detection is a thorough hand search?

Mr. Spicer: That point of view can be substantiated in view of the present state of the art. The X-ray facilities have their inadequacies, but the system as a whole worked at Heathrow last week, for which I am grateful, and I am happy to report that to the House.

Mr. Higgins: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that there are adequate facilities for security checks of passenger baggage going into the holds of aircraft? Are those facilities being used by the airlines?

Mr. Spicer: One can never say that one is entirely happy about anything to do with security checks. Both technological and practical procedures are available for dealing with baggage going into the holds of aircraft, and they are used as they apply.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is it not true that the only reason why the operation at Heathrow last week was successful was that the hand search revealed a discrepancy between the weight and the contents of a passenger's case? Is the Minister seriously suggesting that he is happy with the existing arrangements? If there are not sufficient staff, and if staff are not equipped properly, surely the problem will arise again?

Mr. Spicer: A number of factors led to the detection at Heathrow. I do not think that the House would want me to go into all the details; suffice it to say that detection took place——

Mrs. Dunwoody: El Al.

Mr. Spicer: Of course there are double systems for checking. The hon. Lady mentions El Al, and I can assure the House that other airlines have similar procedures and believe that a similar circumstance could have been detected.

Mr. Dicks: I disagree with my hon. Friend. I believe that security failed at Heathrow and that it was only the additional protection taken by El Al that prevented a disastrous incident. Can my hon. Friend assure me that the commerial viability of the airport will not take precedence over the security and safety of passengers?

Mr. Spicer: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. A permanent balance must be struck between the convenience of passengers and the needs of security. In times of high tension, the need for security must clearly be paramount.

Mr. Tony Banks: In view of the enhanced security needs of Heathrow, will the Minister guarantee that no one-person-operated tube trains will enter the extension area? Will he go further and ask London Regional Transport to put guards in each of the carriages on tube trains entering the airport?

Mr. Spicer: I cannot give the guarantee that the hon. Gentleman seeks. Obviously the security aspects of trains entering the airport will be closely monitored.

London Buses

4. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to modify the performance objectives he sets for London Buses; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I gave London Regional Transport demanding objectives designed to secure better and more efficient public transport services. I am very happy to tell the House that revenue subsidies for LRT this year will be down to £79 million, which is about one third of the level planned by the GLC when it was responsible. This has been achieved without any significant reduction in the quality or any increase in real prices of the services provided.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend congratulate LRT on the improved services that it has provided since it was established following its removal from the auspices of the GLC? However, is my right hon. Friend aware of the delays and consequent frustrations of passengers using buses in heavy traffic? Will he give an assurance that driver-only buses will be used only after exhaustive tests have shown that they will be of benefit to the passengers and will not create further delays?

Mr. Ridley: I shall certainly pass on my hon. Friend's congratulations to the chairman and board of LRT on what has been, by any yardstick, a staggeringly successful performance. LRT already incorporates the effects of congestion into its appraisal of conversion to one-person operation. I also believe that the congestion effects have been much exaggerated, for reasons to do with factors other than congestion, by those opposed to one-person operation.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Secretary of State willing to join any bus queue in Battersea and tell people waiting at that queue that he believes the services are now staggeringly successful? Is it not true that one-person-operated buses are causing delays and frustration and are not a way to keep satisfactory services operating?

Mr. Ridley: There has been practically no alteration in bus services since LRT took over from London Transport. The only alteration has been a 2 per cent. change in services at the margin. If services were wrong before they may well be wrong now, but LRT is improving services to meet customer demand.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the parking and garaging requirements, which are quite properly applied to London Buses in central London, and which it observes, should be applied to all coach operators?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend probably knows that we have been studying the provision of coach stations and possible coach parking sites in central London. Because of the massive increase in the number of long distance and tourist coaches in London, we will take a little longer to get on top of this problem.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Secretary of State plan to alter the objectives as they affect the regularity of bus services and the price for short journeys in areas such as mine, in south-east London, where no alternative form of public transport is available and where, since LRT took over, services have been reduced, as admitted by SELKENT and management, and where local people are demanding more frequent bus services and, on some routes, a reduction in the relative costs?

Mr. Ridley: Perhaps the deregulation of bus services in London would assist in solving the problem referred to by the hon. Gentleman, by allowing other operators to supply any demand not met. Overall, I do not believe bus services have been cut. A slight change has been made to accommodate areas in which there is more demand at the expense of areas in which the demand is less. A future objective will be to reduce the revenue subsidy cost, which this year is estimated at £79 million. It is even possible that we shall reduce that to zero. Moreover, there will be a saving of £245 million to the hon. Gentleman's constituents, as ratepayers and taxpayers, on what the GLC intended to spend.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I regularly travel by bus and wonder whether my right hon. Friend does so, too. Will he discourage LRT, at least in central London, from replacing the traditional open platform bus with one-person-operated buses, which deter passengers.?

Mr. Ridley: They also deter violence. Where one-person buses are being operated there is a far better record of safety for bus crews. I believe that it is better to leave the management of London buses to LRT. It is not my role actually to run the operation.

Mr. Stott: Are not words such as "better" "more efficient" and "staggeringly successful" a prostitution of the English language when applied to London Transport? When I am in London I regularly use the buses, and I was late for Committee last week, as were some of my hon. Friends, because I had to wait 40 minutes in a bus queue for the No. 159 bus. Over the past few months the service in London has deteriorated. How can the right hon. Gentleman claim success?

Mr. Ridley: I know that it is galling for the hon. Gentleman that there has been this massive change proving the GLC to be wrong in its forecast of the subsidy that would be necessary. I realise that the increase in investment is unwelcome to him. If he wants me to respond to the complaints in his supplementary question, I shall bring forward the date on which London will be deregulated, so that other operators can come in from the private sector to ensure that the hon. Gentleman arrives on time for his Committees in future.

Mr. Squire: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is excellent news for ratepayers, taxpayers and everyone who uses buses that about £4 million has been saved under the guidelines by going out to tender while retaining a similar passenger mileage overall on the routes tendered?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend points to an important issue. He will know that 52 routes have so far been put out to tender at a saving of about £2·5 million a year, not £4 million. That is the saving so far, and it is a staggering sum to have been saved on those routes. A further 6 per cent. of total mileage is to be put out to tender in 1986-87.

National Bus Company

5. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Transport what improvements in customer services he expects from the privatisation of the National Bus Company in seperate sections.

Mr. Ridley: The separate sale of NBC's individual subsidiaries will promote more competition in the bus industry. Deregulation and competition will give operators the freedom and incentive to provide the bus services which best meet the needs of the travelling public.

Mr. Dixon: The Secretary of State must know that unions have already been notified of massive redundancies within the bus service. My constituents have been informed of drastic cuts in bus services in their areas. Many of the warnings given by my right hon. and hon. Friends during consideration of the Transport Bill are now being proved to have been right. Many will find themselves without bus services as the effects of that measure are felt.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may know that the National Bus Company has reduced its work force over the past 10 years from 70,000 to 50,000 because the system of decline and subsidy was allowed to continue. I expect that there will be an increase in employment in the bus industry as demand picks up due to competition. It is time that the Labour party stopped trying to pretend that services which have not been registered will not be run. Labour Members know that stage one is to register commercial services and stage two involves local authorities going out to tender to fill the gaps that they think exist. It is misleading, scaremongering and irresponsible for hon. Members to pretend that stage one is the only stage.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Will my right hon. Friend say whether there is any evidence that new types of services are being introduced?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir. My hon. Friend will be glad to know that minibuses were first introduced in Exeter as a result of the publication of the Transport Bill. Minibuses are now in Bristol, Bath, Dartmouth, Luton, Shrewsbury, Cheltenham, Taunton and Leicester. They are already greatly increasing patronage and the number of drivers in employment. At the same time, they are showing a much better financial performance than the old, large buses. This is a direct result of the Transport Act, a measure which Labour Members opposed so passionately and wrongly when it was passing through the House.

Mr. Allen McKay: Will the Secretary of State tell Richard Benson, who is one of my constituents, and his fellow travellers — [Interruption.] These constituents have discovered that the first bus to operate in the Penistone area will start on its route at 8 am and that the last bus to serve the area will leave at 6 pm. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell Richard Benson how he is to get to work and how others will be able to visit hospitals, for example, when the last bus leaves at 6 pm?

Mr. Ridley: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman's informants are fellow travellers. They are trying to spread alarm and despondency without revealing the full nature of the facts. He knows—if he does not, I am telling him—that the local authority in his constituency has the power and the money to let an operator provide early morning and evening services by means of tender and contract. The hon. Gentleman can explain to his constituents that that is the fact, instead of perpetuating myths that are typical of fellow travellers.

Air Services (Scandinavia)

6. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made towards the liberalisation of air services to Scandinavia.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have secured a welcome simplificaton and speeding up of procedures for new routes, but this is only a first step. We want to see real competition on routes to Scandinavia and the lower fares that this would bring. We shall continue to press for this.

Mr. McCrindle: I welcome that reply. What has been the reaction of the Scandinavian authorities to the proposals? Is there a likelihood of liberalisation of services resulting in fare reductions in the near future?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend's question implies that there will not be fare reductions. We are pessimistic about the matter, especially about multiple designation, by which more than one airline is permitted to fly along a particular route. I hope that my hon. Friend's question will be heard in the capital cities of Scandinavia, because we certainly agree that there should be lower fares on these high-fare routes.

Bus Routes (West Yorkshire)

7. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of existing bus routes have so far been registered under the provisions of the Transport Act 1985 in West Yorkshire.

Mr. David Mitchell: Six hundred and fifteen local services with stopping places in West Yorkshire were registered with the traffic commissioner by 28 February. The figure for current road service licences, which is not directly comparable, is 681. The tendering process should be used to fill these gaps and to supplement commercial services in the evenings and at weekends.

Mr. Waller: Does my hon. Friend recognise the extent to which many people have been needlessly misled into thinking that those routes which have not been registered will disappear? Does he accept that this reflects one of only two possibilities — either there is stunning ignorance by local Labour and alliance politicians about the facts, or a cynical attempt is being made to frighten, alarm and deceive people before next month's local government elections?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has hit the target, just as he did yesterday when he completed the charity-sponsored marathon. My hon. Friend is right. The transition works in two stages, the first involving the registration of profitable services, and the second, which is still to come, involving the provision of contract services on socially necessary routes. The people who are frightened by the scandalous campaign run by the Opposition will have the certitude of a contracts service with their county council if they are on a socially necessary route.

Mr. Pike: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many of the services that run from West Yorkshire into my constituency in Lancashire, which adjoins West Yorkshire, will not be tendered for and maintained? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that will be another symptom of the reduction in services to the public as a result of the Transport Act 1985?

Mr. Mitchell: No, I do not accept that. That is not the case, and it will be proved in the event not to be so.

Mr. Stott: I absolutely reject the hon. Gentleman's comments that the Opposition have been scaremongering. Is the Minister aware that, of the current routes run in West Yorkshire, only 71 per cent. have been registered with the traffic commissioners, which means that about 30 per cent. remain unregistered? Is the hon. Gentleman further aware that 35 per cent. of evening routes and 50 per cent. of Sunday service routes have been registered? Those are broad averages, because registration ranges from 70 per cent. in Bradford down to 20 per cent. in Wakefield. Will the hon. Gentleman say with absolute assurance that those routes currently run by the passenger transport executive which have not been registered will receive sufficient financial support from the Government even though the county may be subject to rate capping and other financial provisions? Will those routes continue to run?

Mr. Mitchell: Whether those routes will continue to run will be entirely a matter for the local PTE and how it distributes its resources. The West Yorkshire PTE has informed councillors that the commercial network mileage has increased from the 55 per cent. previously assessed to 75 per cent. of current mileage. That is a major justification of the statements by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and me, and a condemnation of the Opposition's distortions in recent months and during the passage of the Transport Bill.

"Tourist Coaches in London"

8. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about his Department's publication, "Tourist Coaches in London".

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The first representations are just arriving. Comments are invited by the end of July.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Is he aware of the growing aggravation between natives and tourists at the congestion that is being caused by many of those vehicles? What would he say if British Rail decided that, instead of using stations, for which it pays rent and rates, it would park its trains in the streets, regardless of the inconvenience to other travellers? Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government's policy is to ensure that coach operators obey the laws, meet the cost of parking, and do it now?

Mr. Bottomley: I should be slightly surprised if British Rail banned coaches from coming to railway stations to pick up or drop passengers. The report's proposals are for improving facilities for tourist coaches to include more on and off-street parking, to get better information and— what my hon. Friend asked for — more effective enforcement.

Mr. Tony Banks: No doubt everyone in the House welcomes our visitors from abroad. When can they expect a fair deal from coach operators in London, and when can Londoners expect a fair deal? The Minister has known about the problem for a long time. Why does he not ask his colleagues in the Home Office just to enforce the parking regulations, then perhaps the whole of Westminster bridge will not be clogged up with tourist coaches?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not think that I have heard a clearer condemnation of the activities of the hon. Gentleman in his previous work across the river. I have had my responsibilities for three months, while he had his for five years. I am tackling the problem, and he did not.

Mr. Soames: I congratulate my hon. Friend on this important paper. I warmly welcome the tourists who come to London and the business and prosperity that they bring to the City. However, does he agree that it is important that there should be a definite improvement in the problem this year, because it is a great bore for the ordinary people of London trying to get from A to B if they are unable to do so because of tourist coaches?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Cartwright: Is the Minister aware that his document includes a picture of tourist coaches parked on Westminster bridge? Does he understand that that is now a permament feature of life, winter and summer? Does he realise that having as many as 10 tourist coaches and the odd icecream vendor on Westminster bridge is a major cause of congestion and a potential accident risk? Does he believe that that ought to be encouraged in the way that he seems to be doing?

Mr. Bottomley: The answer to the first part is yes, and to the second is no.

Driving Licences

9. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many driving licences issued by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in respect of motor cars were valid at the latest available date.

Mr. Michael Spicer: At the end of February 1986 the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre held a total of over 40 million drivers records, of which nearly 30 million relate to holders of current licences. Licences normally allow the holder to drive a range of vehicle types. Therefore, a separate figure of those covering motor cars is not available.

Mr. Bruinvels: A substantial number of people possess driving licences, whether provisional or full. Does my hon. Friend agree that there is now a genuine need to prevent possible abuse when the licence circulates away from the holder of the licence? Therefore, as a matter of urgency, should we not introduce photo identity pass licences so that people can prove that they are entitled to drive and so that the system is not abused or the licence sold on the black market?

Mr. Spicer: We have no evidence that such abuse is widespread. Insistence on a photograph on a driving licence would not square well with the long period driving licence up to the age of 70. We do not think that the British people would welcome a document which smacked of being an identification paper.

Mr. Anderson: Has the Minister noted how infrequently the DVLC now figures in questions on the Order Paper, and when it does as today, it is referred to in a non-critical sense? Is that not some measure of the quality of performance of the centre? Will he give a public commendation to its work?

Mr. Spicer: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who, I think, has the DVLC in or near his constituency. I can confirm that the number of complaints has decreased substantially; certainly it has decreased very substantially compared to the increase in business done by the DVLC. Therefore, I certainly join in the congratulations to that part of government which is is the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

M6 Northern Relief Road

10. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the timetable for the statutory procedures following his announcement on the preferred route for the proposed M6 northern relief route.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope to publish draft orders for the line of the route in the middle of next year. A public inquiry would follow some months later. The publication of side road and compulsory purchase orders is not expected before 1989.

Mr. Howarth: I thank my hon. Friend and his predecessor for the care with which they have considered the complex issue of the M6 relief route. My constituents have warmly welcomed the non-statutory consultation period offered by the Government, but I am alarmed about the time scale to which my hon. Friend refers. My constituents are becoming concerned about the uncertainty arising from the timing of the procedures. Could my hon. Friend not expedite them, and could he also reconsider——

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Howarth: Will my hon. Friend reconsider the question of compensation and whether it would be possible to offer replacement value?

Mr. Bottomley: It is important for people to have a chance to air their views both in the pre-statutory period and during the statutory procedures. I doubt whether we would have roads as effective as we are now delivering if people were not given a chance to have their questions answered and their views considered.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Director of Public Prosecutions

46. Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what steps he takes to satisfy himself that the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions operates efficiently.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): In discharge of my statutory duty of superintendence of the Director of Public Prosecutions I frequently meet the Director and senior members of his staff. I receive frequent reports concerning policy issues and issues concerning the efficient management of his Department.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Attorney-General recollect the serious questions put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and to the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary, on the worrying case of Mr. Gerry Gable? As Mr. Gable, the editor of Searchlight magazine, was afforded police protection, why has the DPP's office failed to act?

The Attorney-General: I understand that the editor of Searchlight was interviewed by police officers in 1984 in response to an approach from him. However, the facts alleged by the editor did not disclose the commission of any criminal offence. If there is any evidence of a criminal offence, the hon. Gentleman should make it available to the police.

Mr. Gow: How confident is my right hon. and learned Friend that, if it becomes necessary to prepare any further papers in the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions relating to extraditions from the Republic of Ireland of those required to answer criminal charges in Great Britain, those papers will be prepared in a way that is entirely satisfactory to the authorities in the Republic?

The Attorney-General: As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said in his statement, all those documents will now be personally supervised by the Director. In addition, my officials and the officials of the Attorney-General of the Republic have been meeting and are drawing up what is known as a check list—rather like a pilot's check list — which will be used whenever warrants are sought from the Republic.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In view of the serious nature of the bizarre but detailed allegations contained in the April edition of Searchlight, will the Attorney-General make a statement to the House at an appropriate moment? Specifically, will the statement deal with the alleged involvement of an officer of the armed forces and an hon. Member in a plot to intimidate Mr. Gable—or worse?

The Attorney-General: I have not seen the April issue of Searchlight. I shall certainly look at it, and I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Legal Aid

47. Mr. Chope asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the latest progress of the negotiations between the General Council of the Bar and the Lord Chancellor about fees for criminal legal aid.

49. Mr. Maclennan asked the Attorney-General what recent steps Her Majesty's Government have taken regarding the remuneration of barristers and solicitors for legal aid work.

50. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the remuneration of the Bar for criminal legal aid work.

The Attorney-General: Discussions between officials and representatives of the Bar on criminal legal aid remuneration are proceeding in accordance with an agreed timetable which provides for a decision by the Lord Chancellor by 16 July. Regulations uprating the current levels of remuneration by approximately 5 per cent. came into operation on 1 April.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. and learned Friend able to assure the House that sufficient funds will be available to pay such remuneration as is decided upon as a result of the negotiations? Is he aware that the 1984 figures show that barristers aged between 32 and 37 were earning only £8,700 a year on average? That was the median figure.

The Attorney-General: That is a direct quote from Coopers and Lybrand. The Lord Chancellor's decision whether more funds should be made available will be made in the light of all relevant considerations, including the relevant provisions of the Legal Aid Act 1974, and also in accordance with the statutory requirement that any increase must be met from moneys provided by Parliament and subject to Parliament's control.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Attorney-General agree that it is relevant to consider that the availability of justice to the less well-off members of our society depends on those people who carry out legal aid work being adequately remunerated?

The Attorney-General: Yes, that is certainly one of the considerations that my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor will have to take into account.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Following the remarks made by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General in our debate on legal aid last Tuesday, will the Attorney-General give an assurance that if extra funds are to be found for the remuneration of the Bar, the financial burden of that will not be placed on the consumers of legal services under the legal aid scheme?

The Attorney-General: That must be one of the many matters which my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor will have to consider.

Rape (Prosecutions)

48. Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General in how many cases involving alleged offences of rape referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions in each of the last five years a decision was made to initiate a prosecution; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Only certain narrow categories of rape offences are required to be reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions under the Prosecution of Offences Regulations 1978. In the five years 1980 to 1984 the Director himself prosecuted 77, 74, 90, 49 and 34 such persons respectively. He additionally advised chief officers of police in relation to other such offences, but statistics are not available as to the numbers in which prosecution was advised.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the list of statistics has shown that there has been a serious increase in the incidence of rape of women of all ages, including young girls? Does he further agree that there should be more prosecutions for their own sake and as a means of reassuring the public? Will he tell the House what action he is taking to ensure the anonymity of alleged rape victims before charges are brought?

The Solicitor-General: The statistics prove that more offences of rape are being reported, and the criminal statistics are compiled on that basis. However, the question whether there should be more prosecutions has to be a matter for the prosecutor and the prosecuting authorities, according to whether the Attorney-General's guidelines are fulfilled. In response to my hon. Friend's second point about anonymity, the reform of the law relating to anonymity is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, but I acknowledge that the 1976 Act —with which my hon. Friend will be familiar—does not fully represent the recommendations of the Heilbron committee.

Mr. Ryman: I am sure the Solicitor-General recognises that there is widespread concern about rape and murder involving young children. Will he confirm that he is entirely satisfied that the officers conducting inquiries into such cases have immediate access to the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions for advice specifically with regard to the conference taking place today to co-ordinate inquiries into many child murders throughout the country?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman has raised an extremely important and sensitive area of criminal law. I can best answer his point by saying that the staff of the Director of Public Prosecutions are always available to prosecutors and police investigators who have problems that they wish to raise in that connection. It is important that that access should be maintained.

Republic of Ireland

51. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Attorney-General if he will seek to meet the Attorney-General of the Republic of Ireland to discuss extradition and other matters of common concern.

52. Mr. Adley asked the Attorney-General when he last met his counterpart in the Irish Government; and what subjects were discussed.

The Attorney-General: I have no immediate plans to meet the Attorney-General of the Republic of Ireland. I have met him on three occasions this year and last met him on 7 April. Work is proceeding between officials on problems arising in the area of extradition.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Did the Attorney-General of the Republic of Ireland give my right hon. and learned Friend any idea when the Government of the Republic of Ireland are likely to start applying the European convention on the suppression of terrorism, which they have signed but which is not yet in operation?

The Attorney-General: As I understand it, a final decision has not been taken. However, it is likely that that matter will require legislation in the Dail.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that patient co-operation with friendly Governments and the resistance of the temptation to meet terror with terror is the best way to tackle terrorism?

The Attorney-General: The co-operation between my Department and the Department of the Attorney-General of the Republic of Ireland is first class. There are constant meetings between officials and we are making very good progress.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman discuss with the Attorney-General of the Republic the kidnap insurance policies being sold in the City of London by Cassidy Davis, Sedgwicks, and Syndicate No. 702? Is he aware that they make payments to the IRA, and will he stop that? Why will he not accept that he has powers under section 10 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act to bring a case in the courts and secure a prosecution? Will he now do that and stop equivocating?

The Attorney-General: I take note of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Winnick: Would it not be useful if the Attorney-General told critics of the Anglo-Irish agreement that the matters raised today are likely to make more progress if there are good relations between the Republic of Ireland and this country?

The Attorney-General: With regard to my Department—the only one over which I can exercise any control—the relationship is first-class and extremely productive.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Sub-Saharan Africa

53. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase the proportion of aid given to sub-Saharan Africa; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Most of our aid already goes to the poorest countries of the world, but we are giving increasing priority to those countries in sub-Saharan Africa where our aid can be used most effectively. Those countries are also benefiting increasingly from mulitlateral aid programmes, to which we are major contributors.

Mr. Wallace: Is the Minister aware that in the decade up to 1982-83 the value of United Kingdom aid to sub-Saharan Africa decreased in real terms, whereas that of all other EEC countries, of Japan, of OPEC countries and of the United States and Canada increased, in some cases more than tenfold? Does he agree that that is a shameful state of affairs? Has that trend been reversed, and will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that reports today of a grain surplus in certain parts of Africa will not be allowed to instil a false sense of security, because as much help as we can possibly give is still needed?

Mr. Raison: I certainly accept that Africa needs help both in the long term and, in some cases, in the short term, although in other areas of Africa the food supplies overall are completely adequate at present. With regard to our own developmental aid, I believe that we are maintaining a steady rate of assistance on the bilateral side. On the multilateral side, there have been increases and we contribute considerably to them. For example, the recent Lomé 3 agreement provided for a large increase in aid to Africa, and we play our part in that.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Could not that important programme be extended from Common Market development funds if that organisation did not spend so many hundreds of millions of pounds dumping cheap food on Libya, which certainly makes no contribution to the improvement of welfare in Africa or elsewhere?

Mr. Raison: The Common Market is a very substantial contributor of development aid both through the Lomé convention, to which I have referred, and through food aid, some of which is dubious, but much of which is valuable.

Mr. Barnett: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the areas of greatest concern are the semi-arid areas of the African continent? Does he further agree that he might be in a position to send a larger proportion of British aid to those areas where it is desperately needed if the Government had not moved away from the policy set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) in the 1975 White Paper "More Help for the Poorest" and if the Government had not introduced commercial and industrial considerations into their aid policies?

Mr. Raison: We are, of course, concerned with aid in the semi-arid areas of Africa and I believe that we make a substantial and effective contribution. We also accept that there should be commercial and political aspects to our aid programme, but, overall, I believe that our programme is marked by a high degree of effectiveness.

54. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's decision not to make a contribution to the special fund set up by the international fund for agricultural development to help farmers in Sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: A British contribution would be at the expense of our bilateral aid programme. In general, we think it better to help agricultural projects directly and through the voluntary agencies rather than to contribute extra money to IFAD beyond our share of the recent general replenishment.

Mr. Chapman: Even accepting that our aid can be more effectively deployed through a grant system arranged bilaterally than through a loans system arranged by a multilateral agency, does my right hon. Friend agree that there must be a concerted and co-ordinated international approach if we are to help the sub-Saharan countries to develop their agricultural economies and thus give the best possible prospects for removing the scourge of famine?

Mr. Raison: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that our aid to poor African countries takes the form of grants, whereas aid through IFAD takes the form of loans. I agree that co-ordination is important. We have stepped up co-ordination recently and, I believe, successfully. We shall continue to do so.

Mr. Deakins: Does not the Minister's answer overlook one simple and important fact, namely, that in sub-Saharan Africa populations are rising rapidly? That alone ought to be enough to make us consider this a special problem requiring a special multilateral solution, such as I have put forward.

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that population pressure in parts of Africa is great. He will acknowledge the increase in the scale of assistance that we have provided. I agree, however, that the matter requires continued and, perhaps, increased emphasis.

Aid to Government

55. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on providing aid to Governments who have not reached agreement with the International Monetary Fund on structural adjustment.

Mr. Raison: Our general policy is to make balance of payments support for countries in difficulty conditional upon agreement with the International Monetary Fund. In the absence of such agreement, the level and form of any assistance must depend upon individual circumstances, and in particular on how effectively aid can be used.

Mr. Holland: The Minister will be aware that, in practice, the IMF's structural adjustment terms have proved a formula for deflation, devaluation and the denial of the public sector and social spending. Is he not worried that countries such as Tanzania have very little prospect of development if those IMF conditions are applied? Is this to be a general or universal policy? Will the Minister make an independent evaluation of the real development needs of those countries, or has the ODA simply become an agent of IMF policy?

Mr. Raison: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's comments. We are absolutely right to support those countries which are prepared to take the steps of policy reform, which are widely accepted as desirable. It is interesting that the recent development committee communiqué stressed the growing commitment of African Governments to policy reform such as the hon. Gentleman talked about.

Mr. Beith: Is the Minister aware that it is often possible for British aid to contribute directly to the welfare of peoples, even when the policies of their Governments on economic or other matters do not meet with our satisfaction?

Mr. Raison: We continue to give aid to countries such as Tanzania, where we have useful programmes. I remain of the view, which is being accepted by an increasing number of African countries, that if we do not have policy reform there will not be any progress but a continuation of the rather depressing record of aid going in without commensurate results coming out.

China

56. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for providing aid to China.

Mr. Raison: We have offered the Chinese Government support under the aid and trade provision to enable banks to make long-term loans at 5 per cent. interest per annum for agreed development projects worth £300 million. In addition, we provided in excess of £2 million for a technical co-operation programme in 1985-86 and we expect to spend more in 1986-87.

Mr. Wardle: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that education and manpower training are fundamental to China's development? What are the Government doing to help meet that need?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend. We are running an important English language training programme and funding scholarships, mainly at post-graduate level, to Chinese students in science and technology and assisting the Chinese through British consultancies.

Advancement of Women

57. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has taken any recent initiatives as a result of the United Nations Nairobi conference on the advancement of women.

Mr. Raison: Since the Nairobi conference I have agreed to make a further contribution of £50,000 to the UN fund for women. We shall shortly publish a booklet setting out our policies and activities on women in development. We have also introduced regular training on the role of women in development for ODA officials.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that reply. The Foreign Office hosted a conference at the end of February on women as overseas students in the United Kingdom, and a report has just been produced. What consideration is the Department giving to recommendations in the report, and what is the Department's initial response to them?

Mr. Raison: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about that.

"Mandate for Change"

58. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he proposes any changes in overseas policy in the light of the consultation document "Mandate for Change" published by the World Commission on Environment and Development, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: We share the World Commission on Environment and Development's commitment to environmentally sound activities. This is reflected in our own programmes and in the guidance notes and checklists issued to ODA's staff.

Mr. Clarke: Does the Minister agree that this is an extremely important document? Does he futher agree that the environment is just as important for those who live in the Third world as for the rest of us? Will he bear that in mind when he appraises projects?

Mr. Raison: I agree that it is a significant document, although it is only an interim one. We shall consider the final document carefully. The environment is an important aspect of development throughout the world.

Nepal

59. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present level of aid to Nepal; and whether he has any plans to increase it.

Mr. Raison: Expenditure in 1984-85 was approximately £10 million. We expect to continue to spend about the same level of aid, and I have recently agreed to provide nearly £8 million towards the cost of rehabilitation of a section of the east-west highway from Naubise to Mugling.

Mr. Alton: Given that about 77 per cent. of people in Nepal are illiterate, that the average life expectancy is only 45 years of age, and that 150 out of every 1,000 children die at childbirth, does the Minister not think that £10 million is pretty inadequate? Following the recent visit to Nepal by his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, has the Minister agreed to make more funds available for those areas of need?

Mr. Raison: There are many pressures on our aid programme, but within it I believe that the amount that we have allocated to Nepal is very respectable. I also believe that the quality of the work that we are doing there is valuable and well appreciated by the people of Nepal.

Primary Health Care

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about primary health care services.

These are the services provided outside hospital by family doctors, dentists, pharmacists and opticians and by the community nursing and other related services. They have never been comprehensively reviewed in the 40 years since the 1946 National Health Service Act, yet they account for nearly a third of total spending on the health service and over 1 million people use the services every day.

The Government are now carrying out a comprehensive review of primary health care. With my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, I am today publishing a discussion document which will form the basis for extensive consultations throughout the country. The Government's main objectives are to raise standards of care and to make services more responsive to the needs of the public. The document we are publishing discusses a number of ways of achieving those objectives.

So far as family doctors are concerned, the introduction of a good practice allowance would reward both those doctors providing the highest standards of care and provide an incentive to others. This is in line with proposals made by the Royal College of General Practitioners. An allowance on these lines might recognise such features as the range of services provided, including preventive activities; the doctor's personal availability to his patients; and the achievement of particular targets for the levels of services such as vaccination.

The Government also believe that the public are entitled to more information about the different types of services that doctors provide, to enable patients to make better choices when seeking a general practitioner. Together with arrangements that would make it easier for patients to change doctors, this would further help to raise standards and make the services more responsive to the needs of the public. This process would be assisted if—as is also discussed in the document—more emphasis was placed on capitation payments in the doctor's remuneration system, so as to increase the financial value to the doctor of the individual patient.

Among other proposed changes is a new flexible retirement system which would mean that, as now, doctors could retire at 60 but with a compulsory retirement age of 70. It is also proposed to end the 24-hour retirement rule where doctors are able to retire and rejoin the Health Service 24 hours later, collect a lump sum payment and in some cases draw both pension and pay in full.

One effect of these changes would be in inner cities, where there is a disproportionately high number of elderly doctors. Although there is some outstanding work already done there, it is particularly important to raise standards in inner cities. This will entail attracting some younger doctors, and to help achieve this the discussion document suggests the possibilites of providing financial incentives within the remuneration system; of adjusting the allowances paid to doctors for practice premises in order to compensate for the higher cost of accommodation in inner cities; and of experimenting with different forms of contract.

As regards dental services, the discussion document outlines ways in which patients could be more sure of getting the full range of National Health Service treatment. To help patients choose their dentist it suggests that the restrictions on advertising might be further relaxed and to improve value for money the Government will act upon the recommendations of the committee which they set up to consider the problem of unnecessary dental treatment. The discussion document also examines ways in which greater emphasis could be placed on preventive measures, and it outlines retirement arrangements similar to those discussed for doctors.

The Government also believe that pharmacists could and should play a larger part in the provision of comprehensive primary care services. The Nuffield Foundation recently published the report of an inquiry which shows some of the ways this can be achieved. Much has changed since the pharmacist's main function was to make up medicines himself, and he should now be enabled to make better use of his skills in advising patients and doctors on the use of medicines.

Among other matters dealt with in the document are ways of improving the procedures for dealing with complaints against family practitioners and the extension of informal conciliation arrangements for dealing with less serious complaints. The document also proposes an independent study of the quality of primary care services in England, initially in one or two areas.

I am also publishing today the report of a review of community nursing services in England carried out by a team led by Mrs. Julia Cumberlege, chairman of Brighton health authority. Among the matters about which the team has made recommendations are the establishment of neighbourhood nursing services, ways of making better use of nursing skills, and the training of community nurses.

The Government intend that there should now be wide consultation on the discussion document and the Cumberlege report, taking account also of documents published by other bodies such as the Royal College of General Practitioners and the Nuffield Foundation. We want to hear the views of all those who are interested in raising the standards of primary care whether as providers or users of the service. To carry forward the review, Ministers will be holding a series of consultation meetings not only in London but in several major cities such as Birmingham, Manchester and Newcastle. We will invite to these meetings professional bodies such as the British Medical Association, the British Dental Association and the Pharmaceutical Society. We also want to take evidence from voluntary organisations, the statutory Health Service agencies, and organisations concerned with the interests of consumers.

These proposals have been put forward for discussion and the consultations will last until the end of the year. Therefore, at this stage, final decisions have not been taken. Many of the primary health care services are already provided to a high standard, but the Government believe that further improvements are possible. It is for this reason that we have embarked on the first overall review of these services for 40 years.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Clearly, everyone will need to consider carefully the details contained in the 150 pages of the Government's proposals, but everyone should bear in mind that the original exercise was designed to save money. In July 1982, the Government announced the Binder Hamlyn inquiry, to look into the control of expenditure and the possibility of operating cash limits. In April 1984 the Secretary of State, no doubt disturbed by the still secret recommendations of Binder Hamlyn, decided to play for time and publish a Green Paper. He certainly played for time fairly effectively, because it has taken him nearly two years to produce it. During the gestation period, all sorts of wild tales emanating from official leaks by Ministers appeared in the newspapers. Open advertising of doctors' services, the promotion of private primary care on American lines and charges by doctors for more expensive services have all been canvassed. Fortunately, none of them appear in full frontal form in the Green Paper. The Government have backed away from the consequences of their own ideology.

We welcome some of the proposals, especially those intended to provide patients with more information and greater choice. The proposals closely reflect the ones that we made in Committee on the Social Security Bill. While most people receive good service from primary care, there are parts of the country and groups and individuals which do not. The least satisfactory services are concentrated in inner-city areas, in some very rural areas and in rundown areas of heavy industry which combine the worst characteristics of both. The Green Paper pays scarcely any regard to the health problems in rural areas. They will be made worse by the Government's damaging attack on rural transport. There is little mention of rundown industrial areas.

The Green Paper refers to the problem of the inner cities, but only promises more of the same. That has not been good enough. Few of the Acheson report's 114 recommendations have been implemented. The last Government initiative has provided less than an average of £17,000 a year to the beneficiary authorities that were supposed to gain so much from the Government's initiative.

The Government are right to seek an increase in the pharmaceutical profession's involvement in day-to-day health care, but it pays no heed to the inherent conflict between objective professional advice and making money out of the sale of drugs. Government supporters of the idea of more across-the-counter sales of drugs should also remember that that proposal transfers the cost from the National Health Service to the patient. That, no doubt, is why the Treasury likes the idea.

We welcome the report of the community nursing review. Perhaps the Secretary of State could tell us why, in his blue document, he is not seeking the view of the public on its proposals for nurse practitioners and a limited degree of prescribing by nurses.

The proposals on dentistry seem unlikely to counteract the soaring cost of dental treatment and the gradual disappearance of the NHS dental service. The Labour party believes that general standards of primary care should be brought up to the standard of the best. We believe that everyone in primary care should in future play a much greater role in promoting good health by a team approach. The Labour party believes that family practitioner committees, or whoever succeeds to their functions, should take on the positive role of monitoring the health of their area and making and implementing positive plans to improve it.

Finally, we believe that, whatever changes are made in primary care and whatever response is made by the professions involved, the general health of our people will not be improved until we have a Government dedicated to eliminating poverty and unemployment, to improving safety and health at work and to providing decent housing and healthy food at prices that all people can afford. Unless the Secretary of State can tell the House that he will be able to achieve all those aims, most of his propositions will have little impact on the health of the worst off and the least healthy people in our community.

Mr. Fowler: I think that the hon. Gentleman was scratching around in his response. His reaction had a lot to do with what is not contained in the discussion document but did not have a great deal to do with what it contains. As far as I could understand the hon. Gentleman's general point, it is that he is disappointed that the proposals are so reasonable. I think that he basically welcomes our proposals. We in turn welcome the report that the Labour party now accepts the principle of the selected list and also the principle of prescription charges. It is a very sensible move on its part.

As for the specific points, such as they were, that the hon. Gentleman raised, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that resources for primary care have increased under this Government by about 24 per cent. in real terms. In other words, the cost of the family practitioner service is now about £4 billion, compared with £2 billion in 1979-80. There has been a significant increase in the number of doctors, from 26,000 to 29,000. There has also been a significant increase in the number of dentists, from 14,200 to 16,500.

I share entirely the view—so does the document—that there is a special need in the inner cities for high-quality services. We have already allocated more resources to the inner cities. I believe that our proposals for the inner cities will continue that improvement. At the same time, we want to achieve better services for rural areas.

I think the hon. Member has misunderstood what the Cumberlege committee report said about community nursing. The committee had proposed that nurses should be given better opportunities to use their knowledge and skills in the treatment of patients. We welcome that and wish to consult on that proposal.

The purpose of the document is to improve standards in the Health Service; that is the Government's intention.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): It has become unjustifiably difficult and cumbersome to transfer from one doctor to another. Does the Secretary of State agree that, if there are proposals to make that easier on the basis of adjusting the remuneration package of a doctor and the advertising of alternative services, that will be widely welcomed by the public.

Mr. Fowler: Yes, I think it will. Changing one's doctor is already reasonably straightforward, and proposals which we have set out will make it even easier. The principle we have tried to set out in the document is that the public have the right to maximum information about the general practitioner who treats them.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Has the Secretary of State resiled from earlier undertakings to publish the Binder Hamlyn report? The consultative process will not take place until 1987, does this mean that the Government have no intention of legislating in the lifetime of this Parliament? Has the Secretary of State finally buried his proposal to cash-limit the family practitioner service?

Mr. Fowler: We do not make proposals on cash-limiting the family practitioner service. The discussion document makes it clear that, currently, it is difficult to control many of the factors which determine expenditure.

The Binder Hamlyn report was received in July 1983. It seems to me that the debate has moved on from that, and the report's recommendations have been taken into account in preparing the discussion document. We do not see any point in publishing the Binder Hamlyn report in addition to the discussion document.

Following consultation and discussion, we want to have direct negotiations with the professions. There is the prospect of either legislation or a White Paper. I cannot say when that legislation will come, but I think the hon. Member would be unwise to assume that legislation could not come in the lifetime of the Government.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chiselhurst): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, unlike the sour grapes of the Labour party, there is a warm welcome on the Conservative Benches for the discussion document—not least, for the concept of a career structure for GPs? The document also places emphasis on the importance of the patient as a consumer.

Will my right hon. Friend expand on his comments on the increased role that he sees for pharmacists? Assuming that professionals will be able to take part in the consultations, through their professional bodies, what method will be open to the ordinary patient, who may not be a member of a consumer body, to put forward his own views on the document?

Mr. Fowler: On the second point, we will be issuing a special leaflet which will set out a summary of the proposals. This is being published today with the consultation document. The leaflets will be made available to any of the public who are interested and want to take part in the consultation exercise.

We want pharmacists to have an extended role along the lines proposed in the report of the Nuffield Foundation. We want pharmacists to play a greater part in advising the public on their health care as well as doing the traditional things such as supervising the dispensing. Such dispensing could be done in a different way. We will take evidence fom the profession on this, but I believe that it is in line with what the profession wants.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I welcome parts of the Minister's statement, but in addition to talking about the need for services to meet people's needs, will he have discussions with his ministerial colleagues on what they can do to improve public access to primary health care in the form of health centres and doctors' surgeries? As a result of the abolition of South Yorkshire county council, bus fares in the county have increased this month by 250 per cent.; that limits the public's access to primary health care, because they lack the necessary funds.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman takes me back to my last job as Secretary of State for Transport. The increased opportunities for new forms of transport provided by the Transport Act will not in any way militate against the developments that we all want to see in primary health care.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): My right hon. Friend's statement will be greatly welcomed by many in the Health Service, but do his proposals for a good practice allowance and a capitation element in remuneration amount to a root and branch reform of the present complex and haphazard system of doctors' remuneration, or is he about to miss a great opportunity? Will he be abolishing all the various additions that are now part of the remuneration calculations, which most people assume are an integral part of a GP's job, and inserting instead a basic payment with, in addition, a good practice allowance on the ground of merit and a capitation allowance for the amount of work done?

Mr. Fowler: The proposals are a development of proposals by the Royal College of General Practitioners. The good practice allowance is an entitlement that will be based on a combination of objective measures such as the GP's availability to the public, immunisation, certain rates, the range of services and a performance review. Other general practitioners will have the responsibility for that. In addition, there will be increased emphasis on capitation fees. At present, a large proportion of a GP's income comes from allowances. About one third comes from capitation fees. We want to change both those factors, and that is fundamental to the proposals.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Does the Secretary of State accept that his remarks and proposals will be treated very cynically by Opposition Members, especially as, since 1981, there has been a cut of more than 20 per cent. in the number of people being trained for a nursing career in Wales? The loss of 700 people in that sector will lead to a diminution in primary health care in Wales. When will the right hon. Gentleman stop making hypocritical proposals and get down to funding the NHS instead of cutting it?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman had better get his facts right. I do not know whether he was in the Chamber to listen to the statement——

Mr. Rogers: I was

Mr. Fowler: —but, as I said, the number employed in the NHS has increased. As I have said, under this Government the number of doctors has increased by 11 per cent. and the number of dentists has increased by 16 per cent. Those are the figures. They mean a better service for the public, and that is what the Government want.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): When my right hon. Friend looks at average and inner-city conditions will he ensure that he does not draw any wrong conclusions about the needs of rural areas? In particular, will he bear in mind the importance of the dispensing practice in enabling people to get to work instead of wasting working time trying to reach a chemist? When doctors who are not in dispensing practices visit a patient who is ill, they have to provide the drugs free, because they have no means of recovering payment for drugs that they take with them and then leave with a patient.

Mr. Fowler: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's general point. We are trying to concentrate on the inner cities, but I hope to have meetings in some of the rural areas in order to gain an insight into their problems. We want to develop those services in the same way. I agree about the importance of general practitioners and dispensing.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Will the Secretary of State amplify the part of his statement which says:

"The Government also believe that the public are entitled to more information about the different types of services" and so on? To some of us that smells of advertising. Is that so? Many of us are worried that people may choose a doctor on the basis of the quality of advertising rather than on the quality of service delivered. In other words, some doctors may be able to spend more money on advertising than others. Will there be come controls over the information given? Will somebody monitor and control the amount of advertising that a doctor could use?

Mr. Fowler: Obviously, it will be open for ranges of organisations to put forward their views on how far the process should go and some will probably seek to have rather wider advertising than is possible at the moment. The discussion document puts forward the case for more information—a move already taking place within the profession. That is being considered by the General Medical Council, but, as I have said before, the general principle that we are trying to put forward here is that the public have a right to the maximum information about the services which different general practitioners make available. Practice leaflets and so on will make clear to the public.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. Friend accept from the Conservative Benches contratulations on the study? May we have some elucidation of whether he is considering that the carrot of incentives and the discipline of increased choice will be matched by providing general practitioners with more comparability information so that they may assess and improve their performance in order to match that of others? Will pharmacists' numbers be guarded in my right hon. Friend's reassessment of their role, since it is worrying that their numbers are being depleted in many areas? Will the community nursing services be given greater responsibilities, particularly for preventive medicine?

Mr. Fowler: On the last point, I hope that will be one of the effects of the Cumberlege report. General practitioners who already act as trainers under the vocational training scheme inside the Health Service for general practice will carry out performance reviews of their colleagues. At least, that is one way to go about it. Legislation is already before the House on numbers of pharmacists. At the moment there is a right to NHS dispensing. Basically we are setting out a way in which pharmacists in rural areas can be protected. However, we do not want an over-provision of pharmacists, as we perhaps have at the moment, in our shopping centres and the rest.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Will the Secretary of State accept that the publication of this long-awaited and long-overdue report is welcome, not least because he has clearly rejected some of the wilder notions entertained by the former Minister for Health and has gone for some of the saner counsels of the Royal College of General Practitioners instead? In accepting the importance of primary care and the strain upon existing hospital services, which can be somewhat reduced by a greater emphasis on primary care, will the Secretary of State also concede that that will mean considerably more money and pump priming in both urban and rural areas? What attention will he give to providing the additional resources which are implicit in his statement this afternoon? Will he also accept that an expanding role for the community pharmacist is welcome and that there are those of us on this side of the House who reject completely the nonsense which was spoken by the Labour Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)—[Interruption.] I would not go to the hon. Members for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and for Rother Valley (Mr. Brown) for health care—who appears incapable of recognising that a chemist can distinguish between profit and the health and well-being of a patient.

Mr. Fowler: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's last point. Resources generally rose to £4 billion in 1984-85, which was a real increase of 24 per cent. Some of the proposals will cost money; others will mean improved value for money or will lead to savings. The overall effect will depend on the outcome of the consultations.

One impact of better primary care on hospital services, especially in inner cities, will be in accident and emergency departments that are presently operating general practices because of the inadequacies in the general practice system. If we can improve general practice, that will be a tremendous plus for the hospital service.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I welcome this initiative, along with the great increase in resources provided by the Government. I wish to emphasise the rural aspect. Does my right hon. Friend agree that distance, small numbers and the remoteness of pharmacies and hospitals aggravate the problem of the country areas? Are not the people living there entitled to as good a service as those living in urban areas? Will he give careful thought to that?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, I certainly will. My hon. Friend's comments are absolutely right. We want the development of general practice and family practitioner services, not only in cities and towns but in country areas.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does not the right hon. Gentleman agree that far too many former patients of psychiatric and mental hospitals live out their lives in appalling circumstances? What is the likelihood of an expansion of the community psychiatric nursing services in England, Wales and Scotland in the near future?

Mr. Fowler: Those services have already expanded, but I am the last to deny that further improvements are necessary. I hope that we can put forward proposals that go a little wider than this document to help that position, which I readily recognise.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the ultimate success of any detailed proposals that result from the discussion document will depend, at least in part, on their acceptability to the many different people who provide the services?

Can my right hon. Friend therefore give us a detailed assurance that the consultation process will be widespread — I was glad to hear him mention voluntary organisations—and will take account even of the views of individual practitioners?

Mr. Fowler: We have given sufficient time for the consultation process and, as I have have tried to make clear, the Government intend to hold public meetings not only in London and cities such as Birmingham and Manchester, but in country areas. That will provide a genuine consultation that will add to the effect and the worth of the proposals.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many of us hear of many cases where the patient suffers more from the treatment than from the original ailment? When he talks of a procedure for examining complaints against general practitioners, does he envisage the setting up of a medical ombudsman?

Mr. Fowler: We envisage simplifying the statutory procedure for complaints. The discussion document proposes to expand the time limit for complaints so that no artificial time span will be placed on the time allowed; it also proposes that oral complaints should be accepted, whereas currently the requirement is for written complaints. We are prepared to listen to any arguments or suggestions on that matter.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and also his proposal to seek the views of those in authority at local level. Can he assure us that he will take into account specifically the comments of the community health councils, family practitioner committees and district health authorities on the way in which care in the community policies are being implemented and the areas in which they need to be strengthened?

Mr. Fowler: I can give my hon. Friend complete assurance on that point; we shall consult all those organisations.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The Secretary of State said that he is concentrating on inner-city areas. Does he agree that the problem of deprivation associated with those areas are also to be found in the older industrial communities of Britain, such as the south Wales valleys? Does he acknowledge that they need the same level of increased resources as the inner-city areas, as they both suffer the same problems of unemployment, bad housing and bad environment?

May I seek some clarification of the role of the community health councils? I am glad that, at long last, the right hon. Gentleman has taken on board some of the suggestions made by the Royal Commission on the National Health Service in 1979. What does he intend to do to strengthen the role of the councils, which represent the views of the consumer to the health authority? Should they not be given more resources and more teeth? I should like to hear proposals to that effect.

Mr. Fowler: For the purposes of this exercise, the community health councils are free to give evidence—I am sure they will — to the Government on primary health care. They are in an especially good position to do so, and I would welcome their contributions.

On the hon. Lady's first point, I understand that there is nothing unique about the problems of inner cities. I have made it clear that we are seeking a policy that will bring improvements throughout the country. However, I want to recognise the position of the inner cities with their high proportion of elderly doctors, difficult working conditions and need for good premises. It is right to concentrate to some extent upon those undoubted problems.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Most of my constituents will welcome the Green Paper announced this afternoon —[HON. MEMBERS: "How do you know?"] Because, over the years, many of them have written to me to complain about a small minority of doctors who, quite frankly, are too old, too rude and too incompetent to do their jobs. My constituents, together with many other constituents, hope that the Green Paper will provide proper redress.

Mr. Fowler: We should also take into account the fact that family practitioner and family health care services in Britain are probably better developed than in most other European countries. The document is intended to improve even further the standards of care provided.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Are not the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland— to whom I have addressed questions on dental care— concerned that dentists often have to make decisions not on the basis of clinical judgment but on their assessment of what patients not covered by insurance are likely to pay, up to £115?

What on earth is all this in paragraph 5 of chapter 4 about companies having to take over certain dental responsibilities? It states:

"The Government would welcome discussions on the balance of advantage between these two points of view."

What does the right hon. Gentleman think about that?

Mr. Fowler: Currently, there are restrictions on the setting up of dental businesses that make it impossible to have under one roof a general practitioner, a dentist, an optician and a pharmacist. It might be for the convenience of the public if that restriction were taken away, so that all those services could be provided in an integrated way under one roof. That is the purpose of the proposals, and that is why we want to hear the views of the public.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his generally welcome statement, and especially on the part that dealt with the increasing problem of the aging practitioners? He referred to them especially in relation to inner-city areas, but does he agree that the problem occurs just as frequently in aging outer-city estates? Can he confirm that, in the light of consultation, he will not restrict his view to the classic inner city?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is correct. I recognise that the problem of elderly doctors is not confined to inner cities. Our latest information is that there are 515 practising doctors in their seventies, 74 in their eighties and two in their nineties.

We think that the present arrangements are out of date. They were brought forward at a time when the idea was to enable elderly doctors to continue in practice. That is not so relevant today.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): What does the Minister think about the reorganisation of ambulance services? Is he aware that in Northumberland absolute chaos has been created by the relatively recent arrival of the new chief ambulance officer, who has murdered the ambulance service throughout the north-east?

Mr. Fowler: Clearly, we want the best possible ambulance service but, with great respect to the hon. Gentleman, this matter has nothing to do with the proposals announced this afternoon.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): All members of the Conservative party will share the emphasis my right hon. Friend is placing on improved quality of service; this is what the people want, above all else. We do not share the paranoia of Labour Members about information and advertising. Does my hon. Friend agree that all the information possible given to consumers about all kinds of medical services must be of benefit to practitioners and to patients and potential patients?

Mr. Fowler: That is clearly right. We have tried to write this document from the point of view of a member of the public. We believe that people have a right to the maximum amount of information possible, and what we have set out in the document takes us towards that goal.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Does the Secretary of State agree that the health of people in the community depends on a combination of services provided by the National Health Service and by local authorities? No amount of administrative organisation, even if for the better, will make up for the continuing cuts in local authority social services, as such cuts damage the very people the right hon. Gentleman seeks to help. In addition, will he say, as he has not mentioned local authority services this afternoon, whether his discussion paper will allow proposals which might suggest a change in the balance between the services provided by local authorities and those provided by the National Health Service?

Mr. Fowler: That matter would certainly be open to argument. Social services have improved and the resources committed to personal social services have increased. The Cumberlege report on community nursing is crucial if we are to provide a better community care service that I agree with the hon. Gentleman is needed.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Although I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and look forward to advertising, will he consider the problems of the inner city of Leicester, where, because of high rates and non-rate capping, many surgeries are no longer available to my constituents because doctors cannot afford to continue to run their practices and also to pay those exorbitant rates? Will he also look at the problem of doctors who cannot afford, because of the rates, to buy houses in the city of Leicester?

Mr. Fowler: I will certainly examine the need for good premises. We intend to review the payment level for premises in inner-city areas. There is a need for new premises, rather than providing, as has too often happened in inner-city areas, lock-up premises. To make that possible, we intend to increase financial help to general practitioners practising in inner cities.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Secretary of State guarantee that the proposals he is making for incentives and greater rewards for better doctors—which we support in principle—will not result in the rewards and the better doctors being concentrated in those parts of the country in which people are healthier and better of?

Mr. Fowler: The whole purpose of the paper and the good practice allowance is to improve the standards of general practice and of general practitioners throughout the country. We clearly want to improve standards in inner-city areas, but we equally want to improve them in other areas, notably country areas.

Libya (Butter Deal)

4.15 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the secret butter deal between Brussels and Libya."

Although there are different views in the House on the use of United Kingdom bases, the whole House acknowledges that Libya is a terrorist state that initiates and co-ordinates acts of international terrorism. There is common ground that action should be taken to coerce Libya into refraining from such deeds. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition argued eloquently for such policies last Wednesday. Such discussion focused on a joint European approach, both as a sensible step in itself and also as a means of reducing the risk of further military action. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has crossed the Channel today to persuade his European colleagues to introduce the necessary measures.

How is it then that the bureaucrats — the civil servants—in Brussels, in direct conflict with the efforts of the Community's political leadership, are empowered to launch and carry through this grotesque and shady deal? A quantity of 4,500 tonnes of butter is to be spirited to Libya at a cost to Libyans of 8p per half-pound packet. What of our own poor and of the starving in the Third world? Beef and milk powder are also being included in this sordid trade. A sum of £7 million of European money will be stuffed into Gaddafi's pocket as a down payment for future terrorist outrages. How many extra deaths will this money buy?

These questions need answers urgently. Can this decision be reversed and the shipments stopped, or do the bureaucrats have complete discretion in this supremely political field? How is it that such a deal was hatched in secret? At what stage was the Council informed, if it was informed at all? At what stage can it make a political impact? Can we prevent our produce from joining this absurd traffic, or is the situation that, while we can control British bases, we have no control over the destiny of subsidised British butter and British beef? Is the decision legal? I understand that the Community is empowered to send subsidised products to some states, but is it empowered to send them to Libya?

There is a need for an urgent debate, first, so that this House can use its power and influence in an attempt to prevent this cargo from being dispatched or, if dispatched, from reaching its destination. There is also a more fundamental reason for an early debate. On Wednesday, we are to consider a Bill whereby the House surrenders yet more power to European institutions. Surely we should sort out the present constitutional nonsenses before we embark on a course of further largesse with Britain's sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the secret butter deal between Brussels and Libya."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I therefore cannot submit his application to the House. However, I hope that he may have other occasions on which he can raise the matter.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I will put together the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Dental Auxiliaries Regulations 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) Consequential Amendment Regulations 1986 (S.I. 1986, No. 198) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Opposition Day

[11TH ALLOTTED DAY] [FIRST PART]

Education

4.19 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I beg to move,

That this House is of the opinion that, in view of the widespread lack of confidence in Her Majesty's Government's education policies, the salary of the Secretary of State for Education and Science should be reduced by £1,000.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Freud: I am pleased to see the Secretary of State for Education and Science in his place, though I am sorry to hear through the usual channels that he has decided not to speak in this debate,, I very much hope that he will change his decision, because this is quite specifically a censure motion on what he has done since he has held office.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): In view of the quality of the spokesmen on the alliance Benches this afternoon, the hon. Gentleman should understand that he is lucky indeed that a Minister of State and an Under-Secretary of State are to contribute to the debate. It is great arrogance on the part of the Liberal party to suggest that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should reply to a debate on a motion moved by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud).

Mr. Freud: One is well aware of the sour grapes of ex-Ministers who intervene before hon. Members have had time to begin to make their speeches. I am deeply conscious of the fact that the Secretary of State is in his place, and I am grateful for it. I hope that he will decide before the end of the debate to intervene as this is specifically a debate about his office.

It is sad that when the Opposition allow the alliance to initiate a debate it tends to be on a day when the European elections are taking place, or, as today, on Her Majesty's 60th birthday. That sadness is compounded when a Minister makes a statement and there is a Standing Order No. 10 application, which mean that an important debate will be restricted to a little more than two and a half hours. I shall be briefer than I had intended to be originally so that as many Members as possible may participate in the debate.

The motion follows the arcane rules of the House in that rather than dismissing Ministers we try to reduce their salary as a manifestation of discontent. I should not like it to be thought that in seeking a reduction of £1,000 from the Secretary of State's salary we are 96 per cent. satisfied with his work. If there is to be some justification for the reduction of £1,000, it should be understood that it is the minimum sum that all teachers feel that they should have deservedly added to their salaries and which, thanks to the monetarist policies of the Secretary of State, they are not receiving.

I found the reaction to the motion interesting. The Labour party, whose critical motions we steadily support. met it with silence. It seems that it considers party political isolationism to be more important than national educational needs. I hope that it will vote in favour of the motion as my colleagues and I have steadily voted for its on education. The Labour party and the alliance have been pretty united to date in condemning what is happening in education.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South) rose——

Mr. Freud: I shall not give way now. I must get on with my speech.

The Government claim to be beginning to think about starting to consider looking at the possibilities; their amendment lacks any sort of genuine direction. This Government have been seven and a half years in office and it is disappointing that only now are they starting to consider education needs.

If it is thought that the Government are beginning to change their spots, it might be sensible to remind the House that an announcement is in the pipeline—it will be made this week or next week — concerning a £263,000 project to survey parental involvement in primary schools. I am entirely in favour of such a survey, but it is typical of this Administration that they choose to finance a survey when the money could be used to train 1,000 people, to finance a substantial pilot programme or to fund a cost-benefit analysis. However, the Government continue to finance surveys, and there has been survey after survey. I have nothing against the National Foundation for Educational Research, which will carry out the survey. It just continues to be a disappointing way in which to spend substantial sums from the education budget.

We had high hopes in 1979. The right hon. Lady was the first person to become Prime Minister after having been Secretary of State for Education and Science. We had high hopes too when the Secretary of State was appointed. We considered him to have genuine concern for education and our hopes were boosted by his memorable speech at Sheffield, which suggested thought and commitment. Unfortunately, our high hopes have not borne fruit, as everyone involved in education will accept.

I do not believe that it is right to take random statistics and use such figures to frame an indictment of the Secretary of State, but the education budget as a proportion of GDP has fallen from over 13 per cent. in 1974 to just over 10 per cent. now. That is a genuine indictment. The proportion of GDP is the one that is important.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon) rose——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose——

Mr. Freud: I shall not give way. Hon. Members will have time to make their own speeches.

The graduate entrant to the teaching profession was paid £3,714 when this Government came into office and he is paid £6,252 now. A graduate entrant to the police force was paid £3,247 when the Government came into office; he is paid £8,442 now. So the graduate entrant to the police who was paid £500 less than the graduate entering the teaching profession is now paid £2,200 more, and that figure does not take London weighting into account. Nor do the figures take account of the substantial overtime provision for those in the police force. There is virtually no such provision for teachers.

It is right to compare the police force and teachers because as the leader of the Liberal party, my right hon.

Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), said, by reducing spending on school books we ensure that more must be spent on law and order. There is a connection between education and hooliganism whether we like it nor not and it is right that that is borne in mind. The relationship between teaching and policing is not merely that of relative pay levels but involves political priorities and synthesis. We are talking about the same children, the same communities and the same democracy. The same money will be spent on educating children or on making good the damage that they do.

The first and most damning charge against the Secretary of State is his lack of leadership. He has failed to fight his corner in Cabinet over resources for education, and he has failed to fulfil the promises that he made in his Sheffield speech. The second charge in the indictment is his incompetence and insensitivity. Let us consider the teachers' dispute and the teachers' request for a 7 per cent. increase. The Secretary of State said that there was no question of the Government giving them that increase but within days of making that statement the Secretary of State voted in support of giving judges and other senior civil servants substantial salary increases on the basis of the recommendations of the Top Salaries Review Body. It was that which infuriated teachers as much as anything else.

Student financial support is another example. The Secretary of State cancelled the inquiry into that support and followed this by abdicating his responsibility to the DHSS, which knows nothing of students and understands nothing of their needs. It has carried out no research into the welfare or support of students and when we ask it questions about availability of student jobs it tells us that no research has been undertaken on that issue. Yet the DHSS now has financial responsibility for student support.

On the subject of incompetence, it is fair to bring up the corporal punishment legislation. If this were not a serious debate, one would say that the Government's attitude smacks of major incompetence. But this might be a good time for the Minister to tell the House of the prospects for introducing that ill-conceived measure which was properly thrown out by the other place.

On the subject of insensitivity, it is proper to refer to school reorganisation and the average delay of 14 months before announcing a verdict. And, even when the verdict is announced, there is no explanation and no recognition of the costs to local authorities when proposals are rejected. Now there is a new trend of rejecting proposals affecting grammar schools, even when, like Stroud, they are supported by local Tories and the schools take between 30 per cent. and 40 per cent. of the catchment.

Another justified charge against the Government concerns the failure to respond to new demands on the service. What prevents the formation of a merged Department of Education and Training, in favour of which both sides of the House have so much to say? By providing financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds — I accept implementation would cost a great deal — we could establish a framework. We know what happened with public lending rights; there was no money to pay authors, but the concept of PLR was right, and it was introduced. I hope that, by the same token, the concept of paying 16 to 19-year-olds to stay in education will be accepted as right. We should not make it financially attractive for 16 to 19-year-olds to sign on the unemployment register rather than remain in education. Perpetuating the 21-hour rule does such great harm, is insensitive and plumb wrong.

My next charge concerns destruction of the partnership — despite the rhetoric of "Better Schools" — between Government, teachers, local education authorities, parents and pupils. Thanks to the Secretary of State, they have been isolated and effectively set against each other by neglect, or perhaps deliberate calculation. The Government have shown that they are either unwilling or unable to work with their partners.

The Secretary of State tells us that he has no power. We say that the power of a good Secretary of State is the power to lead, to inspire and to make the partnership work to create a climate in which partnership can flourish. I am afraid that the Secretary of State has been discredited. In fact the biggest ovation at the conference of the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers occurred when a delegate made that point.

The breakdown has two consequences. The most serious is that, although the Secretary of State has a duty to the maintained sector of education, everything he has done has caused the flourishing of the private sector. Every hamfisted intervention, every setting aside of Her Majesty's Inspectorate's strictures has boosted applications to get out of the maintained sector. No matter the cost, people put down the names of their children for education in the private sector. The success of the private schools is bought at the cost of the state schools. They suffer from the teachers' dispute, and the introduction of GCSE and A/S levels. It must be clear to every Government Front Bencher that A/S levels vastly benefit those children who can be educated in the private sector, which has the ability and finance to provide the relevant education which cannot be found at other than the largest comprehensive schools, certainly cannot be provided by those schools in my constituency.

Consequently, there are increasing calls for the abandonment of the partnership. They come from the Right wing of the Conservative party, which prefers to bypass the democratic process with the dishonest rhetoric of freedom of choice which it offers under the shorthand of "vouchers". The calls come also from the centralisers, who argue that the Department of Education and Science should step in where the partnership has failed to deliver. We oppose both moves. Vouchers offer opportunities to a selected few rather than standards for the many. As the Minister of State has said a number of times, they are "practically hopeless".

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): Nonsense. I said it once.

Mr. Freud: The hon. Gentleman might only have said it once. It has been repeated, and, if I may say so, once is enough.

Centralisation offers no suggestion that the Department of Education and Science would be any better at providing the service. The Department cannot escape the charge of unaccountability. The vouchers idea is a smokescreen to cover the lack of direction and achievement in the past seven years and the lack of valid and convincing responses to Government critics. The idea has nothing to offer. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has said, there are no gimmicky solutions to the problems of providing better education. It is easy to dream up new schemes, such as Crown schools, or to advocate vouchers, but that is political escapism, designed only to fill a gap in the next election manifesto.

Mr. Marlow: What would the hon. Gentleman do about ILEA?

Mr. Freud: If the hon. Gentleman will wait, I shall tell him exactly what I would do.

The alliance believes in partnership. It is not a case of everything being rosy before 1979 or of plucking dates from the sky and saying, "It went bad then" or "It was good then." I do not believe that simply putting more money in will rectify the problems or that the old partnership is fully adequate to meet today's needs. We in the alliance are uniquely qualified to speak of partnership in education, not just because of our political organisation but because of our roots in local government and belief in people—their rights and abilities.

It is strange that, if there is a crisis in education, nothing is done, but, if there is a crisis in almost any other branch of life, the Government bail us out. In 1978, when there was a major flood in the Fens, central Government said, "Spend 1p of your rate money and we shall give you 75 per cent. of all the extra expenditure." Crises and disasters in education are identified by Her Majesty's Inspectorate, that most professional body. The crises of high truancy, poor achievement, misery among teachers and despair among parents can be solved only by a local education authority. However, if the local education authority spends money alleviating a disaster, it is penalised and fined for doing its job. Rate capping they call it.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): The hon. Gentleman has raised a serious matter. Does he agree that a problem arises when we have a remote control system operated by the Department of Education and Science in England through local education authorities? If education authorities choose to spend their money on what some of us might think are less essential matters, which are not part of their education duty, it is difficult to say that they do not have enough money to undertake properly activities for which they have a clear statutory duty.

Mr. Freud: I have considerable sympathy with that view. There is no simple answer, but it is wrong for a local authority which does its duty to be painted with the same brush as those local authorities that exceed all normal standards. I am not saying that there is a simple solution. I am saying that there is a virtual breakdown in the partnership which should exist between central and local government, let alone teachers, pupils and parents.

I promised the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) that I would give a brief list of the alliance's priorities in education. We would return more autonomy to local government and we would institute an education ombudsman, or ombudswoman, who would listen to genuine complaints which, at the moment, have no route whereby they can be heard or brought to the attention of an independent arbiter. We would open access to educational records. We would provide training for parent-governors and, with the devolution of more decision-making, would involve individual schools. That is currently being done in Cambridgeshire where we have tried an independent financial system for schools so that headmasters can make their own decisions. At the moment that may not be totally accepted or work brilliantly but it is an innovation which I think is genuinely appreciated and can be built upon.

We believe strongly in fixed term headships. I think it is right that the head teacher should not be secure until retirement. We believe in having pupil members on governing bodies and we believe that working with parents should be included in initial teacher training. We believe that teacher's pay should be linked to their conditions of service. I know that on that issue I have the consent of the Conservative party, even if I do not have the consent of the Labour party. We should use HMIs not just as inspectors but consultants. What they say and recommend should have more clout than currently. By using central Government money for specific purposes rather than asking the local education authorities to bid for their own money and, above all, by respecting local government, one would renew the partnership which used to exist. Henry Morris, the director of education for Cambridgeshire, said very tellingly in the 1930s that every dictator realises how obstructive to power is local government and every dictator abolishes it.

I do not like what is happening now, with more power going to central Government or the Crown schools being brought in as if, all over this country, we do not have enough schools of proven excellence in the public sector of education.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Freud: I am coming to the end of my speech.

I would like to put new life into the partnership by putting more stress on community education, which is currently regarded in some Conservative circles as slightly more dangerous than the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. I believe that community education can start to meet the legitimate demands of an increasingly aging and leisured society. I saw examples of community education in Coventry the other day where the school is open for 24 hours a day and the cleaners come in late at night. The school is open for further and higher education, for vocational teaching, for games and for meetings, which are able to take place at low rentals. We should involve members of a community in a school, treat people as more mature and responsible and recognise that the value of a service is a consequence of the stake that the people put in it. I have always felt that involvement in all sectors of education was essential to make the public responsible. Even in primary schools, to have the children vote on what sort of sweets they have in the school shop or the location of the telephone box gives them an identity with a school which stops them——

Mr. Sumberg: While the hon. Gentleman is running through the shopping list of alliance policies, will he tell us whether it is correct that the alliance would phase out the assisted places scheme? Will he also confirm that he will attack the charitable status of the independent sector? I would like to make it clear to my electors, who might think about voting for the alliance and whose children attend private and independent schools, exactly what they are voting for.

Mr. Freud: I am pleased to answer the hon. Gentleman. We would certainly phase out the assisted places scheme. It seems absolutely wrong, especially for the Secretary of State for Education and Science, to give up on the education of academically talented children. It is right that there are children of academic ability who should move from one school to another. However, we totally reject the notion that the only schools to which they should move are those in the private sector of education.

The alliance would look at charitable status again. I do not see that there is anything charitable about Eton or Harrow. I think that it is proper to have a yardstick and to give charitable status to institutions which do an element of charitable work. We would say that a school could have charitable status if its shows that it deserves it and shows that it does something for the community which will allow education for those who cannot pay, for example, perhaps a minimum number of scholarships in a school. Certainly it is wrong for the community to suffer a shortage of rate payments and tax payments so that an elitist body can go on being elitist.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) rose——

Mr. Freud: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am sure that he will make his own speech.

I ask the Secretary of State to remember that education should not merely be a consequence of good government but that good government should be a consequence of good education. Currently, we have neither.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the education policies being pursued by Her Majesty's Government, which are beginning to tackle the urgent need to raise and sustain educational standards at all levels of ability, to create a wider range of opportunities for young people, and to enable the education system to make its full and proper contribution to national life.".

I welcome the opportunity for this debate. However, I am not sure that I thought the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) was worth a grand. He seemed to nail his colours to almost every fence going. I shall return to that shortly. I also welcome the interest which at least some Liberal and Social Democratic Members are taking in education this week. Normally, as the House knows, they leave these matters to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East who labours manfully on his own. However, with the local elections in prospect and with the growing salience of education as a political issue, the hon. Gentleman finds himself with at least a few of his hon. Friends here to sustain him today, but none of his right hon. Friends. I am sure that he finds that extremely gratifying. It seems to me that it is another example of the potency of Dr. Gallup.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I am sure that on reflection the hon. Gentleman will concede that that is a wholly bogus point. We cannot produce every single one of our members at every debate any more than he can.

Mr. Patten: We are pleased to see at least some of the hon. Friends of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East. We are sorry not to see the leader of the Liberal party or the leader of the Social Democratic party.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. Patten: This is the finest hour of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East. This is the charge of the light brigade. We are sorry not to see here the leaders of the Liberal party or of the Social Democratic party for reasons which I shall seek to adduce shortly.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland) rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way later.

I should like to concentrate mainly on schools and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will speak mostly about higher education when he replies to the debate.

I want to take as my text the speech given by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) at Ruskin college in October 1976. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is nodding. The right hon. Gentleman was the leader of the Government which the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends so assiduously supported. I shall take it as a text for three reasons. First, it set out an admirably bipartisan agenda for the reform of education. Secondly, it launched what the right hon. Gentleman described as the great debate. Thirdly, the present Government have spent the past seven years taking action on a number of the matters that the right hon. Gentleman talked about in that speech. We have turned into reality a number of the aspirations that he referred to then.

I should like to quote three sentences from the Ruskin college speech which, in my judgment, should enable us to sweep aside some of the partisan clutter that normally dominates debates such as this.

"I fear that those whose only answer to these problems is to call for more money will be disappointed."

Expenditure per pupil was 14·5 per cent. lower at that time than it is today. The right hon. Gentleman continued:

"But that surely cannot be the end of the matter. There is a challenge to us all in these days and a challenge in education is to examine its priorities and to secure as high efficiency as possible by the skilful use of existing resources."

That is a salutary reminder — the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East touched on the point and then backed off—that any serious debate on education should contain more than a drab recitation of rival statistics. There is no mechanistic relationship between the level of expenditure on education and the output of our schools. If there were, life would be a great deal easier and the standards set in ILEA schools would be second to none. Nor is there any evidence to relate variations in local education authority expenditure to variations in achievement levels.

On the other hand, I accept that the admirable objectives that we set out in our White Paper "Better Schools"—for example, the hoped-for spread of TVEI from the pilot stage to a wider range of schools—will need more investment per pupil. We have achieved that. We have been investing more per pupil. I am surprised that the Opposition parties rest their arguments on education so much on expenditure levels, although I concede that the Opposition now tend to mix that argument with the sanctimonious argument that we are entirely wrong to add up the cost of their promises—and not only in the case of education. The Opposition suggest that that cost would not be very high and that we could do it all for the cost of the return fare to Brighton.

Resting on spending levels is not a comfortable posture for the Opposition. Let us get the figures out of the way and turn to more serious matters. Expenditure per pupil is now higher than ever. It has risen by about 18 per cent. since the Government came to office. In January 1980 there were 18·7 pupils per teacher; now there are 17·8. Expenditure on books and equipment has risen in real terms by about 8 per cent. per pupil. There has also been a smaller increase in expenditure in real terms on repairs and maintenance. The average real salary of a teacher today is £800 more than it was when Labour left office.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) rose——

Mr. Patten: The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth made his speech at Ruskin college in a year when the value of teachers' pay fell in present-day terms by over £1,000. Those were the high days of inflation under the Labour Government. I suppose that a teacher might have stayed slightly ahead of the game if he had been paid in gold bars or cocoa futures.

The figures do not suggest — and I understate the point—that everyone in education has all the resources he wants. As I go from local education authority to local education authority, that is not my experience. The figures do not demonstrate that we are making the best use of our money. They do not dispose of some of the arguments to which I shall now turn. However, they certainly dispose of the proposition that education is suffering from a ludicrous shortage of resources and that everything could be put right if we simply spent a little more. Those propositions are 18 carat nonsense.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the Minister accept that since 1979 the Government have reduced educational expenditure in real terms by about £2·5 billion? Many economies of scale were made during the 1970s, and it is not reasonable for the Government now to expect economies of contraction too. It costs as much to heat a classroom if there are 20 pupils in it as it does if there are 30.

Mr. Patten: That is a strong argument for getting rid of surplus places — which we are anxious to do as rapidly as possible. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East did not concede that the number of pupils in our schools has fallen by about 12 per cent. in the past six or seven years.

Mr. Dalyell: I have asked the hon. Gentleman about the difficult subject of physics teachers. Has he read the leading article in the New Scientist of 10 April entitled "Money for New Rope" in which it is stated that "in a number of schools, below sixth form level, there may well be no physics teachers in the foreseeable future"?

Mr. Patten: I have not read that article, but I will do so. I will take up the hon. Gentleman's point later on.

In his Ruskin speech, the right hon. Gentleman identified a number of educational issues which had to be tackled. He talked about the relationship between parents and education and between the world of work and the world of school. He talked about the curriculum, examinations and teachers. I should like briefly to deal with that agenda.

Our Education Act 1980—I must pay tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) who laid many of the foundations on which we have built — did much to increase parental influence on, and involvement in, children's education. The Bill at present in another place, which we hope will shortly come to this House, takes that process a good deal further. I trust that we can rely on the unremitting and unstinting support of the alliance parties in taking that legislation to the statute book, despite reports of recent speeches by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), whose interest in education has not survived until this debate. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was talking for himself or for the alliance. However, he lauded parent power and local autonomy. They were in while, in his view, central control was out. I mean no disrespect to the right hon. Gentleman, and I am sorry that he is not here. In view of his recent interest in education, I would have expected him to be here.

Mr. Alton: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. Patten: It is not the Prime Minister's motion.

I must say that I have always found the "power to the people" side of the right hon. Gentleman's personality less convincing than the "power to Dr. Owen" side. The right hon. Gentleman talked about parent power and local automony. Then — the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East exhibited a similar form of schizophrenia — he advocated giving Her Majesty's inspectors the power to recommend school closures, and providing central funds to set up new schools.

As an innocent bystander I think that there is a contradiction in those propositions. They are perhaps, another example of tough and tender out riding. Whatever the conundrums or paradoxes, I am pleased that we can count on the support of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties when we put on the statute book that legislation which takes parent power and parental influence much further.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth continued in his famous speech at Ruskin college to consider the relationship between work and education and the relevance of the curricula. The Government have acted on those points. We have established much closer links between education and the business world through schemes such as young enterprise, the school curriculum industry project and the understanding British industry project. We have promoted economic awareness as part of the school curriculum and we have brought non-advanced further education closer together with local industry and the Manpower Services Commission. We have placed more emphasis in schools on the application of knowledge and we have encouraged the growth of craft design and technology. Technical and practical learning have been stimulated through a number of pilot schemes like the technical and vocational education initiative in which 100,000 pupils will be involved at a cost of some £250 million. As I said earlier, we are considering the extension of that project so that all secondary school pupils can benefit from the lessons that we have learned.

As the House will know, the Government have been setting the pace in the use of computers in schools. We have invested almost £40 million in the past five years on information technology.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth continued in his speech to discuss curricula. Despite all the difficulties and turmoils, the Government have worked for agreement with teachers and local education authorities about the type of curricula that we should have in our schools which we believe should be broad, balanced, relevant and differentiated. We have also been working for agreement on the different parts of the curricula. We began by publishing our proposals which have been discussed and are now in their final form on the teaching of science for five to 16-year-olds, and we shall shortly be producing——

Mr. Dalyell: What about physics teachers?

Mr. Patten: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's point in a moment.

We shall shortly be producing proposals on modern languages as part of the curriculum. The Government's main purpose is to try to ensure that 80 to 90 per cent. of our school leavers aged 16 are brought up to and beyond the level now achieved by 50 per cent. of pupils in a range of subjects—that is approximately CSE grade 4.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has shown a great concern for the lower achievers in our schools. The lower achievers' programme aims to discover and spread a curriculum which will interest and involve that worrying minority who are now getting very little from their secondary schooling.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth also raised the problems about the examination system. He was specifically concerned about less academic students who remain at school beyond the age of 16. He proposed that there should be more discussion about 16-plus examinations and about other examinations, and he told us that Mrs. Shirley Williams would consider those problems. We have acted. We have introduced or are proposing to introduce A/S levels to broaden the base of the curriculum in sixth forms, and I do not accept what the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East said about that earlier.

The Government have introduced the certificate of pre-vocational education with the new sixth formers, about whom the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth was concerned, in mind. As the House will know, we are conducting a review of vocational qualifications which will soon reach fruition and this year we are starting the GCSE, which is the most significant reform of 16-plus examinations for 20 years.

We had an opportunity to debate the GCSE last week and all hon. Members who took part in that debate regarded it as useful and constructive. I do not want to traverse in this debate the ground that we covered then. I shall, however, make four brief points. First, the preparations for the GCSE are literally unprecedented. Secondly, we have tried to respond to every legitimate professional concern. For example, we have considered resources and training in that connection. Thirdly, I repeat what I said last week, that postponement for a year is not an option. We could not stand down the boards and groups and require them to produce some makeshift GCE and CSE examinations in 1988 with machinery which, in many cases, has already been dismantled, and at the same time tell them that they must get on with the job of introducing GCSE the following year. A postponement would lead to a protracted delay against a background of chaos. My fourth point is that we are always ready to discuss with teachers associations, examining groups or local authority associations professional concerns about the introduction of the GCSE. We want to ensure that the GCSE examination is the success that it needs and deserves to be.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): If everything is going as smoothly as the Minister so blandly suggests, why does he believe that the secondary heads and the Parent Teachers Associations are so anxious as to call on him to postpone the examination? Does he realise that that anxiety extends far beyond the teacher organisations and is now so widespread that he cannot blandly dismiss it, as he has tried to do?

Mr. Patten: I was not trying to be bland. If the hon. Gentleman had had the opportunity of listening to our debate last week he could not have accused the Government of blandness. We are anxious to do all that we reasonably can to ensure that the GCSE examination is introduced smoothly. I had the opportunity of addressing the Secondary Heads Association conference yesterday and I have spoken to other professional bodies. I recognise their anxieties and a number of their concerns are related to the last argument I wish to make regarding teachers.

The final piece of the jigsaw concerns teachers. I accept that a fair and sensible deal with the teachers would greatly improve the climate for the introduction of the GCSE. That is behind many of the anxieties expressed at present. If we do not get such a deal, much more than the GCSE will unfortunately be threatened. That underlines the importance of achieving a deal in the summer.

I have said before, and am glad to repeat myself, that without good and highly trained, highly motivated teachers our other objectives for education are as sand in the wind. Because we are concerned about training, we have, with the help of the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, been attempting to improve standards in initial teacher training. We have done much to improve and develop in-service training because we are concerned about better quality teaching. The Government want to see better paid teachers, a better career structure and improved promotion prospects with better rewards for skills in short supply.

In response to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I believe that until we achieve those objctives it will be extremely difficult to deal with the serious skill shortages that he mentioned. Once we begin to deal with those problems there are many other imaginative and radical proposals that the Government could discuss with industry for dealing with the shortages that have been evident for too many years but are especially acute today.

We must establish a clear link between what teachers are paid and what they are paid to do. Teachers cannot argue on the one hand that it is impossible to define what they do in a contractual sense because it is all a matter of good will and on the other hand argue that that good will can be withdrawn at considerable damage to schools at no cost to themselves, whenever they so wish. The teachers cannot have both those propositions. That is the nub of the argument and the main reason why we have suffered such a wretched year, and that is the issue we cannot run away from. It is ludicrous to suppose that that has only been a problem for the past two years.

We hear a great deal about "back to Houghton". The problem goes back to Houghton and Lord Houghton made that point recently. I cannot quote him directly, but in essence he said that it was not just salary scales that were written on the banner of Houghton. He said that his report, as well as dealing with money, was an attempt to establish and define professionalism. The teachers received the money but we have never managed to achieve the other side of the bargain. That is what we must achieve now.

The past year has been wretched partly because the discussions which were taking place in the autumn of 1984 had the plug pulled on them by the National Union of Teachers. The discussions were held to bring together pay, duties and conditions of service. If those discussions had been successful, we would not have had to endure the turmoil and aggravation of the past 12 months.

[Mr. Patten]

ACAS, with the employers and with representatives of the majority of teachers, is now attempting once again to resolve this issue which has been with us for so long. If we are to achieve a deal that is fair to teachers, fair to taxpayers, fair to ratepayers, fair to employers, fair to parents and, above all, fair to children, it must link pay and duties once and for all.

Mr. Marlow: I hope that my hon. Friend is right and that that will come about, to the great satisfaction of the teaching profession, but how will it resolve the problem of inner city schools, especially those under the ILEA, in which a great deal more money is spent per pupil but the results are much worse than elsewhere? What plan has my hon. Friend to deal with that?

Mr. Patten: I emphasise again that the key to education quality and standards everywhere is good teachers. My hon. Friend is being very persuasive, tempting me to take a walk down one or two boulevards into which I perhaps should not stray, not least in the interests of others wishing to take part in the debate. I hope that there will be other opportunities to deal with the point that he raises, as it must be of particular concern to many of us that one of the disadvantages faced by some children in inner city areas is the attitude of a minority of teachers and of some members of the education authorities in those areas.

The agenda set out by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth 10 years ago was extremely sensible and I am delighted that we have been able to act on it. It is perhaps presumptuous to say "we". The main credit for what has been achieved in relation to the curriculum, teacher training, links between industry and education, parent power, examination reform and the drive to raise the quality of education in all schools to the level achieved in the best should undoubtedly go to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has carried through a major programme of reforms which will work through into higher standards of state education for the next 10 or 20 years. Other changes which have been discussed in the past few weeks may need to be contemplated to ensure that the partnership on which the education system is and continues to be based works as well as we all wish. I am sure that the Opposition will wish to contribute to that discussion.

Today, however, we have to deal with the motion on the Order Paper. In the past few years, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had to endure more than his share of slings and arrows and has borne those tribulations with more forbearance and civility than most of us could muster. Compared with all that, today's preposterous motion is but a minor irritant. Nevertheless, I am sure that I speak for my right hon. and hon. Friends in saying that I resent its appearance on the Order Paper and invite the House to throw it out.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) on his speech. I am glad that it was made by the hon. Gentleman and not by the leader of the Liberal party as originally advertised. Unlike his leader, the hon. Gentleman has always shown an interest in education matters. However, despite the glorification of local government, he ignored the record of the Liberals in the Isle of Wight and glossed over the split between the Liberals and Social Democrats on loans. It is perhaps a pity that more SDP Members are not present today. Nevertheless, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his speech and assure him that Labour Members will vote for the motion today.

I, too, am disappointed that the Secretary of State will not be answering the debate. Perhaps he is so enthusiastic about cutting public spending as to support a cut in his own salary. Be that as it may, I welcome this opportunity to debate education matters as there is a growing awareness of the vital importance of education not only for individual life chances and self-development but for the survival of this country. As we move towards a knowledge-based economy, it becomes ever clearer that our future will increasingly depend on human capital in terms of the intelligence, information and creativity of our people. It is equally clear that the best way to develop that capital is to invest carefully and effectively in education and training. It is clear, too, that in today's and tomorrow's world the prizes will go not to nations prepared to educate only their elites but to those which give good quality education to all their citizens.

It is therefore all the more disturbing that, according to a number of recent studies, we are less well educated and less well trained than many of our main competitors. Only one third of the work force in Britain holds recognised qualifications equivalent to O-levels, compared with two thirds in West Germany and Japan and almost 80 per cent. in the United States. Britain is also well down the league table in providing education and training opportunities for young people. In 1983, 64 per cent. of the 16 to 18 age group received such provision, compared with 84 per cent. in West Germany, 79 per cent. in the United States and the Netherlands and 73 per cent. in Japan. A much smaller proportion—12 per cent.—of the relevant age group has qualifications at degree level compared with 22 per cent. in the United States and 24 per cent. in Japan. Moreover, the proportion of adults receiving training or enjoying continuing education is much smaller than in a number of other advanced countries. Relatively speaking, Britain is a badly educated and badly trained nation.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman share my anxiety that in ILEA schools, which are permanently dominated by the Labour party and the National Union of Teachers, pupils with the lowest ability suffer most and achieve the worst examination results?

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman may be unaware that the programme of reform that ILEA is putting through has been welcomed by the Secretary of State. I refer to the Hargreaves report and the follow-up to that, which was directed precisely at below-average and average achievers. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I should wait until 8 May for the verdict of the electors on what ILEA has done so far and is planning to do in the future.

It is against the background of relative educational backwardness and what is needed to equip ourselves for the future that we have to judge the Government's performance. The plain truth is that they have a miserable record. It is widely recognised even by members and supporters of the Government that the Conservatives have failed on education. Our schools do not have the level of resources for the job that we are asking them to do. Even the Secretary of State has admitted that teachers are underpaid, as has the Minister of State. For the past few years, Her Majesty's inspectors — the Secretary of State's own advisers — have been warning the Government about the shortage of teachers in key areas, to which reference has been made today, the inadequate supply of books and equipment and the bad state of repair and maintenance of too many of our schools.

The most significant and worrying paragraph in the recent HMI report, paragraph 89, said:

"While most LEAs appear to have held or slightly improved the overall levels of their provision for schools, the baselines of some of that provision are such that it seems unlikely that present levels will be sufficient to enable schools to respond successfully to the national and local calls for improvements in pupils' achievements and in the curriculum."

Mr. Eric Bolton, the chief inspector of schools, underlined that in a recent speech when he warned that, unless schools receive sufficient resources, the changes that are being demanded cannot be implemented. He went on to say that, while money was not the only answer—I agree with the Minister about that—it is a vital part of the solution. I did not hear that from the Minister today, although I shall quote him when he appears to recognise that money is important.

Mr. Eric Bolton said that the TVEI had shown what could be done when teachers are given adequate resources and time. That is instructive. In his recent speech to the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association conference, the Minister said:

"The demands on schools are increasing, and there is a need for more resources per pupil and a further limited improvement in the pupil-teacher ratio if they are all to be met."

I hope that the Secretary of State will argue for that in Cabinet.

We also have a crisis of morale. We all know that, for more than a year, most children's education has been disrupted in some way, leaving pupils uncertain, parents anxious and teachers demoralised and alienated. Too many of our schools now exist in an atmosphere of crisis, as I know from personal experience.

The Minister referred to the reforms which the Government have heralded, but many have come to nothing while others have petered out in bickering and dispute. It is interesting that the amendment does not boast of the Government's educational achievements but speaks of their "beginning to tackle" educational standards.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: After seven years.

Mr. Radice: Indeed. I accept that educational reform takes time, but that is going too far. Under the Conservatives, the United Kingdom is about the only major Western European country which has cut resources going to higher education. The consequences are well known. Since 1981, 12,000 well qualified students have been turned away from our universities each year and 6,000 jobs have been lost in universities. In the next three years, cuts equivalent to the closure of a medium-sized university every year are to be imposed on the university sector. It is reported that Sir Peter Swinnerton-Dyer, the chairman of the University Grants Committee, has warned that three universities may have to be closed. I hope that the Minister will comment on that. Perhaps he would care to deny it.

Polytechnics and other institutions of higher education have rightly been praised for their contribution to the provision of more opportunities for quality higher education, yet they face the possibility of a 3 per cent. cut in 1987-88. The National Advisory Body secretariat has told public sector institutions that, if the unit of resource is to be maintained, the institutions will have to exclude more than 9,000 students and close whole departments, including engineering and science departments. The Secretary of State rightly keeps going on about maintaining standards, but he cannot have it both ways. He must provide the money. Despite the lip service which the Government pay to its importance, resources for continuing education have also been reduced significantly.

Bearing in mind the Government's poor record, the crisis in our schools and cuts in higher education, it is hardly surprising that education has become such an important issue. Voters believe that education should have top priority. They want the Government to get a grip on things. Above all, they want a return to calm and stability in schools.

The Government's reaction to mounting popular discontent has hardly been reassuring. It is no exaggeration to say that the Government have been running around in a state bordering on panic. The Prime Minister, apparently oblivious of the fact that the Government have been in power for more than seven years, is reported to have declared that something must be done about education.

The Foreign Secretary, on one of his few sorties into domestic politics, told eager listeners on the "Today" programme:

"Education is the most important part of the national agenda still calling for action".

The Secretary of State for Energy, in one of his messages —as usual, it was in code—implied that more ought to be spent on education. There is, of course, the reactionary tendency. It is not as well represented today as usual, although I see one member of it present. Encouraged by the Prime Minister, it has dusted off several old ideas— yesterday's solutions to today's and tomorrow's problems.

We have been told that the answer to raising standards for all pupils is the introduction of vouchers, despite the Secretary of State's conclusion that they are not practical. A return to direct grant schools has been mentioned, as has more selection and even the introduction of what are apparently called Crown schools, which borrow the prestige of Her Majesty to support selection. I hope that most parents will fail to see what those notions have to do with the education of their children. Indeed, they will find those notions irrelevant.

I have never questioned the Secretary of State's sincerity and integrity. On behalf of the Labour party, I have supported him when I thought that he was right. However, for some time past, I have thought that it would be better for education if he resigned. He has clearly lost the support of parents and of teachers. He has said that he will retire at the end of this Parliament, but there is speculation that he will go in the autumn. I do not believe that, when parents are so concerned, schools are in such crisis and education is a top priority, we can afford a lame duck Secretary of State. We have had the unedifying spectacle of Ministers almost daily putting in applications for the job. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) is never off the screen.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): Off the streets, or the screens?

Mr. Radice: I am not sure about the streets. Bearing in mind his electoral prospects in Bath, he is probably on the streets as well. I have seen the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson), at whose name the hon. Member for Bath is said to pale according to one newspaper, spending quite a lot of time in the House of Commons recently.

Mr. Fletcher: Shock.

Mr. Radice: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's name has been mentioned, but many have. Tomorrow, The Guardian is running a punter's guide to the 11 runners so far. Such speculation and rumour is not good for education and the only way in which it can be ended is by the Secretary of State deciding that enough is enough. It would be in the best interests of education if the uncertainty about the Secretary of State's job was rapidly brought to an end. I have therefore to repeat my call for the Secretary of State to resign.

Changing the helmsman alone is not enough. If we are to equip ourselves adequately for the future and to meet the challenge that I have described, which I believe is widely accepted, the Government will have to change their education policy. We shall have to widen educational opportunity, to improve standards and to invest more in education.

The main aim of educational policy should be to open up opportunities for quality education throughout life. Every three and four-year-old should have the chance of a place at a nursery school or in a nursery class. Every child should have the opportunity of being taught in adequately resourced comprehensive, primary and secondary schools, and in classes small enough to allow for individual attention. Every 16-year-old should have the right to two years of high quality education and training with adequate financial support. Every adult should have the right to benefit from a period of education and training, and we ought to open up higher education to a much wider group than ever before.

We must also introduce measures that will address this Government's neglect of quality and standards. This must include smaller classes, particularly for younger children; an adequate supply of books and equipment; well maintained and well ordered schools; access to a broad and balanced curriculum; an assessment system that encourages success rather than highlights failure; a real partnership between home and school; a local ombudsman for parent complaints; and a decently paid, well trained and highly competent teaching profession.

Mr. Chris Patten: How much?

Mr. Radice: How much more does the hon. Gentleman think ought to be spent in order to ensure that the demands on schools are met? He does not say how much.

Mr. Patten rose——

Mr. Radice: The fact is that neither "Better Schools", the White Paper produced by the right hon. Gentleman nor the Minister of State himself has costed his proposals. He is giving the electorate a lot of promises for the future while having failed in the past. If his promises are to be carried out, a substantial amount of extra money will have to be spent on education. We acknowledge that, but the Government are not honest enough to do so.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: Not at the moment. I should like to comment on the progress of the ACAS talks, because they are important. I hope that they succeed, because, as the Minister said, unless we can settle the teachers question, we shall not get further progress in our schools. I hope that those talks succeed, but if they are to do so it is clear that the NUT — the majority union — will have to be included. I am absolutely certain about that. I am also certain that more resources will have to be provided to back the ACAS talks. If they are not, I do not believe that we shall eventually get a deal.

Mr. Madel: Is it not a fact that the NUT will not agree to the 1985 deal and that it was in a minority? If the hon. Gentleman wants the ACAS talks to succeed, he should urge the NUT to be more reasonable and not to adopt an attitude that will make it run foul not only of the Labour-controlled employers but also of the other unions.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman probably does not know that I have spent the last four days trying to bring both sides together — [HON. MEMBERS: "It was a failure."] I would not talk about failure on that score, given the mess that the Conservatives have made of this whole teachers question over the last two years, which has disrupted our schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for being so generous in giving way. Will he clarify another important point? Is it the view of the Labour party that a deal must include duties as well as pay? I understand that that is part of the Labour party's position north of the border. Is it the Labour party's position south of the border as well?

Mr. Radice: I have said that we must first tackle the pay issue. Once we have done so, I believe that it will be easier to introduce the whole issue of duties — [HON. MEMBERS: "They can be brought together."] That may well be so, but that depends on the amount with which the Secretary of State is prepared to back the deal. If he continues to say that the sum should be only £400 million at the end of the fourth year — which he calls £1·2 billion—I doubt whether he will achieve the results that he is looking for.

If opportunity is to be increased and quality improved, we shall need to increase spending on education. I am not ashamed to say that, because education is expensive. Since the Conservative Government came to power, the share of education as a percentage of total public spending has declined from 11·8 per cent. in 1978-79 to 10·8 per cent. in 1985-86. A sign of the Government's priorities is that in 1985-86 we are spending £3·7 billion more on defence than on education, whereas in 1978-79 we were spending £260 million more on education than on defence.

It is true that, despite cuts in educational spending—which the Minister of State has admitted have taken place —and because of a school population which is declining sharply by nearly 1 million, the Government are able to claim that spending per pupil is now significantly higher than in 1979. That is true, but instead of using the leeway of falling rolls to repair the glaring inadequacies of provision and the necessary investment in improved standards which the chief inspector says are so important, the Government have imposed tight restrictions on educational spending. Indeed, under this Government, spending on education has often been thought of as a luxury item which, as with higher education, can be cut without damage to the future. No wonder that the voters are now demanding a higher priority for education!

From now on we should regard spending on education not as a consumption item that can safely be cut but as a prudent, long-term investment without which our future is likely to become increasingly bleak. We should also decide here and now that education should be top priority. It is of vital importance, not only for personal development and improved life chances but also for the future economic and social health of our society.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. There is less than an hour to go before the winding-up speeches begin. I therefore appeal for short contributions.

5.38 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): It would seem that the alliance has now discovered education, as it had earlier discovered the environment, and perhaps we might look forward to a considerably better attendance at our debates in future than we have seen in the past. I exclude from that comment the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud). His attendance at our debates is exemplary. Indeed, his attendance is as regular as "All-Bran".

While the conversion of the alliance to education may be a little late, it is, none the less, welcome, and it seemed to be signalled in a recent speech by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) when he said that if the case for investing in higher education is strong, any such favourable treatment has an obligation to ensure greater efficiency in the use of extra resources. That seems to be a long-winded way of saying that the alliance requires value for money in education. There is nothing wrong with that. Indeed, that argument has been advanced by Conservative Members for years.

In the same speech, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say:

"Universities and polytechnics would set up student aid offices which would receive funds—decided by the institution from the sum of the research and teaching allocations—for various forms of student support on an income-related basis."

When one strips away all the jargon one sees that the right hon. Gentleman is calling for some sort of means test for student support. In the same speech he said:

"this income-related basis could include remission of fees and maintenance grants; it could include subsidies for the interest charges and bank loans arranged through the institution which might even go into the loans itself."

I am not certain whether the right hon. Gentleman is arguing for a full-blooded student loan approach, or for some sort of halfway house. It is unfortunate that he and the leader of the Liberal party are not in the House to answer for themselves and to clarify points of this sort. I should like to concentrate on schools.

Mr. Henderson: Was that the same speech in which the right hon. Gentleman advocated what is essentially a free enterprise economy between the universities in competing for students?

Mr. Pawsey: I can tell my hon. Friend that indeed it was. In 1976 the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) introduced what was described as the "great debate on education." Therefore, we can take it on his authority, and he was the Prime Minister at the time, that all was not well with the education system. That has been recognised by Conservative Members in a series of measures introduced by the Government since we came into office in 1979. As was said previously, we now have the best ever pupil-teacher ratio and the highest ever level of per capita spending. As the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said, that, admittedly, is as a result of falling rolls.

Almost the first act of the incoming Administration in 1979 was to repeal the Education Act 1976 which removed choice from local authorities, attacked grammar schools and sought to introduce comprehensive education. The author of the Education Act 1976 was Shirley Williams who was Secretary of State for Education in a Socialist Government. At that time she seemed to be rather more Socialist than Democrat. It is significant that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was part of that same Administration. Now the right hon. Gentleman argues for more parental choice. How does he reconcile that newly discovered position with the provisions of the Education Act 1976 which he then supported? It is indeed sad that the right hon. Gentleman is not in the House. I do not say that he is two-faced, but it seems that, once again, the alliance is facing two ways.

Despite the exaggerated rhetoric of Opposition Members, much has been done over the past seven years. Parents now have more choice in selecting schools, and teacher training has been overhauled to ensure that teachers receive a training more relevant to the classroom. On Thursday we debated the introduction of a new examination—the GCSE. It was demanded by teacher unions to replace the CSE and the GCE.

Despite the propaganda, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State said, no previous examination has been so thoroughly prepared. It is not preparation that is lacking but goodwill. The real problem is not lack of syllabuses, lack of training, lack of time or lack of funds, but a lack of goodwill, and that is the problem that we have to face. The reason for that lack of goodwill is not hard to find. Understandably, teachers are worried about pay and conditions, and teachers are to education what the engine is to the car.

We should not forget that my right hon. Friend has secured from the Treasury £1·25 billion of extra funding, not for schools or for books, but for teachers' pay. That money will be available to teachers over four years and when it is accepted will do much to restore teacher morale. However, the four-year time scale is too long and the financial benefit should be concentrated in a shorter period with a higher level of what the insurance companies call "front loading". Hand in hand with those improved and substantial benefits should go real appraisal. Not all teachers should be in the profession and we should make it easier for a small minority of teachers to leave.

Teachers hold the key to improved education and to higher standards, and it is of the utmost importance that we restore the morale of the teaching profession and make it abundantly clear to teachers that what they do is necessary, worth while and most important to society. No one would disagree that the overwhelming majority of teachers do a difficult job and do it well, and that a teacher's job is a great deal more than free periods and long holidays. A teacher's job is stressful and demanding, and, while there may be substantial job satisfaction, that in itself is not enough and a greater appreciation of the teacher's work is necessary. For too long they have been allowed to believe that theirs is almost a second-rate profession that is unsung and unappreciated. That impression must be corrected as a prerequisite to any improvement in education.

The Education Bill that is currently in another place is proof of the importance that the Government attach to education. That Bill will reform governing bodies and allow a greater measure of parental involvement. That should be widely welcomed on both sides of the House and should also be welcomed by parents and members of the teaching profession. The Bill will do a great deal to improve standards and to improve the quality of education, because the majority of parents know best what is right for their own children. More parents on governing bodies will ensure that more time is spent on the core curriculum and less on peripheral subjects, such as peace studies. Parents will call for more discipline in schools and demand the teaching of subjects that are relevant to jobs and to work.

The Bill will require local education authorities to appraise the performance of the teaching force and will make further improvements to in-service training by the provision of special and specific grants for that purpose. All those measures underline the Government's commitment to education. I support the imaginative concept of Crown schools which was unfairly criticised by the Opposition. However, I should like to make one caveat by asking that they become centres for technical studies as well as for the more academic subjects. The Crown schools could be a way forward in concentrating technical and academic talent.

Mr. Beith: Did the hon. Gentleman not listen to the cautionary words by his hon. Friend the Minister of State who said that the argument about defending good grammar schools is largely dead and buried and that no one will bring back the old grammar schools?

Mr. Pawsey: It is nice to welcome the hon. Gentleman to the debate. We are not calling for the return of the old grammar schools. I will settle for the concept offered by my right hon. Friend of Crown schools, provided that they concentrate talent on either technical or academic subjects. Those schools will become centres of excellence and people will accept them as a useful and imaginative step. Some hon. Members have spoken about funding, but more money does not automatically mean better standards. The National Council for Educational Standards published a pamphlet today that deals with a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). That pamphlet shows that the Inner London education authority examination results are worse than the results in secondary modern schools. It says:

"Examination results for secondary school pupils in the Inner London Education Authority (ILEA) are worse than for pupils at secondary modern schools".

It goes on to say:

MORE MONEY FOR WORSE RESULTS

ILEA pupils aged 11 are up to the national average. By 16, their exam results are 30% below the national average even though ILEA spends 40% more per pupil than most councils. On average, O-level passes per pupil in ILEA schools are about 40% below the average for pupils in all schools in England; about 25% below the average for pupils at comprehensive schools in socially deprived areas; about 15% below the average for pupils at secondary modern schools."

Those figures are an indictment of the high spending lobby and underline yet again that it is critical for funds to be used effectively.

Value for money is not just a pious hope; it is an absolute necessity. The problem is not so much the lack of funds as the lack of proper application of those funds. More money is not the answer. More money equals greater waste, to the disadvantage of the taxpayer and the children.

The Government want to provide a much wider measure of choice for parents and for children. That choice must not be between just the state sector and the private sector. We want to improve the quality and the standard of state education. That is where the overwhelming majority of children are educated. I know that the present Secretary of State for Education and Science is committed to that ideal. The judgment of history will be to his advantage. The alliance motion is ill-considered and biased and should be thrown out.

5.50 pm

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): If one believed the stuff to which we have just listened, it would indeed be a lyrical world. One could almost set parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) to music. The amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister — [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is she?"] She is probably with the Queen. It is hardly conceivable that the Government could include such bland, offensive effrontery in this amendment. It says that the Government

"are beginning to tackle the urgent need to raise and sustain educational standards at all levels of ability".

That need is all the more urgent after what has happened during the last six and a half years since this Government came to power.

The amendment then says that the Government are beginning

"to create a wider range of opportunities for young people".

How can the Government say that, after what they have done to the youth of this country? Nearly all of them are out of work. Furthermore, student grants have been cut so much that even those dead Benches rose to the attack last year and forced the Secretary of State for Education and Science to alter his plans.

The amendment also says that the Government are beginning

"to enable the education system to make its full and proper contribution to national life."

Ye Gods! When the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth referred to the National Council for Educational Standards, he was referring to the Black Paperites, who have launched on behalf of the Tory party the most dreadful offensive against state education that those of us who spent a lifetime in education have ever seen.

Mr. Pawsey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: No, I want to make my speech. I listened to the hon. Gentleman without intervening. He must sit down and be a good boy.

When I mix that amalgam in the Government's amendment with the arrogance of practically every sentence spoken by the Minister of State, it would be childish to expect us to treat it in a civilised way. In the opinion of the Opposition, education begins at birth and it continues until we die. However, there is no recognition of that fact on the Government Benches. The state education service has never known such a sustained and brutal onslaught as it has suffered during the last six and a half years.

It is almost unbelievable that the Government say that they have carried out reforms. The Secretary of State will be remembered in the history of education as having deformed practically everything that has been done for education throughout the years. He has not reformed education. He has succeeded in uniting the teaching profession. It opposes his attack on education, and the struggle continues.

The Government should not believe that the struggle is at an end. Never before in the history of this country has a middle-class group of people been so determined to fight in defence of the education system. Never before has the struggle continued for a year and a half in Scotland, where a resounding victory was won because the Labour authorities stood side by side with the Educational Institute of Scotland.

Parents and children, students and lecturers, teachers and tutors do not know where they stand with this Government and with this Secretary of State. That is why I, who find it hard to say such things, wish, in the name of heaven, that he would go. I hope that he will take with him the rest of the Government, after what they have done to the education system.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science has managed to unify the teaching profession in a way that the Opposition could not do. There is a hiccup in the struggle, but hon. Members should not be fooled. This struggle, the longest in the history of the teaching profession, will continue.

Teachers' wages are pitifully inadequate. They get less after training for four years than a young policeman in uniform gets after three months. What kind of an attitude is that to adopt towards the teaching profession? [HON. MEMBERS: "You have got that wrong."] That is the reality. The teaching profession is embittered and angry. Never before has it been so embittered and angry, and this fact should be laid at the door of the Secretary of State.

The general certificate of secondary education is in jeopardy, due to this Secretary of State and this Government. Teachers have fought for years to unify the general certificate of education and the certificate of secondary education. For years they fought against this Government in an attempt to get rid of them. Finally, the Government capitulated, but then they dealt with the teaching profession in such a way as to rouse it to fight against what is happening to education. Therefore, the Government, not the teachers, are holding up the ambition of teachers and parents that the GCSE should be introduced.

Our schools are unprepared and unpainted, and in many areas they are falling down. Schools are closing not because of the lack of pupils but because they are in such a mess. When the Secretary of State came to Sheffield his only comment about those schools — he said it, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not I—was that they were "crummy". Sheffield will never forgive him for that, never mind his Sheffield speech. He had rate-capped Sheffield. Sheffield could not provide proper schools for its children, but he had the nerve to condemn those schools.

I raised that point with the Secretary of State on more than one occasion during the Select Committee proceedings. He said that Sheffield should make up the difference. I pointed out to him that in the more salubrious areas wealthy parents could provide a great deal of money for the schools and that therefore their capitation allowance is three times greater than that which is provided for schools to which the children of working people go. There is a great deal of unemployment in the areas surrounding those schools.

I asked the Secretary of State about unemployment. I told him that parents who are unemployed do not have money to give the schools. His answer once again—it was a recent answer — was that the local education authority should give them the money. But he has rate-capped Sheffield. He knows that the local education authority cannot make up the money. While, therefore, the children of wealthy parents get all the books and allowances that they need, the vast majority of our children are suffering because of this Government's actions.

The Government have introduced the ethos of the market place into our education system. Monetarism has been introduced into education, as though education can be bought and sold easily by one person at a time who has vouchers. The drive to privatise our schools continues.

Education has moved towards the centre of the political stage because the majority of the British people feel that it is under serious attack. They feel that the attack against state education is so brutal that they must enter the arena and defend an education system that has been built up patiently over hundreds of years. It is now a major electoral issue. At every meeting where we make speeches, or indeed where the Conservatives make speeches, education is now raised.

The situation is bedevilled and the crisis deepened by constant statements by almost anybody on the Tory Benches. The ideas which are put forward by Tory Members are like sparks coming from an ampere. Such ideas persist for a few days but are so backward that they are thrown out. However, no less a person than the Prime Minister brings the ideas back or, if she does not do so, the Minister does. The voucher system has been thrown out by everybody over and over again but, a year ago, the Prime Minister came back and said that she would still like a voucher system. The Minister finally had to admit that, although he liked the voucher system, it was impracticable. However, even after the Minister had said that, the Prime Minister returned once again and said that she would like a voucher system. People therefore realise that elitism is the main aim of the Tory party. The Tory party hates the profound success of our schools under comprehensive education.

Nearly 90 per cent. of our children are taking examinations which, some years ago, they had no chance of passing. The examination results of the vast majority of our children are better than they have ever been in the history of British education. I have heard the attacks on ILEA but the silly figures used mean nothing because ILEA covers an inner-city area with more problems than the general areas of cities. ILEA's starting point in the education of our children is a difficult one. ILEA needs special funds, as do the inner-city areas of the great cities.

What are some of the so-called ideas which have been sparked off by the Prime Minister and the Minister? They have put forward a totally unworkable and discredited voucher scheme. The chairman of the Tory party — a major figure in the advancement of mankind — wants Crown schools. I do not know what Crown schools are or what an uncrowned school is, and I wonder whether the Tories can tell us. Of course they will not. A Crown school is a school which would be centrally funded to become part of excellence. The school, having received more funds than anyone else, could be something to be boasted about. It runs hand in hand with the idea of bringing back direct grant schools and introducing direct grant primary schools. What an idea! All these useless ideas mean nothing but the ethos of the market place. The ideas are so backward that they are unbelievable.

[Mr. Flannery]

The Tories want to extend the assisted places scheme — another piece of elitism. The education of our children has been curbed by funds being cut, but some of the funds would be stolen from the state system to be given to the Government's nominees in the private system. Money would be taken from the already depleted exchequer of education and handed to people in the private sector who already have plenty of money.

The Government's only object seems to be to get rid of the state education system. They will not be allowed to do so because, standing guard over it, are not only parents who are Labour voters but parents who are Tory and Liberal voters. They all want the system of comprehensive education to continue. They recognise that it has its weaknesses but want them discussed in a proper democratic manner and want the system strengthened, instead of the nonsense introduced by the Government.

The Government's ideas have one thing in common —they are not merely destructive but aimed to strike a blow at the education system from which it will not recover. All these ideas hark back to the bad old days so beloved by the Tory leadership—the so-called Victorian values of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister loves Victorian values. She would love the teachers to return to payment by results from the register which was abolished at the beginning of the century. If she received payment by results from the Cabinet, they would all disappear tonight.

We have to struggle patiently, and fight hard, for good education. Of course, some teachers are not up to the mark, but some hon. Members, some dentists and some engineers are also not up to the mark. That is the reality of life. That cannot be ruled out of order.

The Government also want to pay teachers Victorian wages. They wish to pay as little as they can and yet talk about the quality of education and improvements in education. If money is not forthcoming for the education system, it is idle nonesense to talk of increasing the quality of education. The quality of education demands more money for teachers' wages, more money for books and money to paint the schools. More money is also needed for repairs and to build new schools. It is no good talking about posing money against the teachers. The two go hand in hand. If teachers are paid properly — and they are fighting to be paid properly—we shall not have recourse to Dotheboys hall and Mr. Squeers.

The Government do not want what we are fighting for. They pay for private education for their children. They are not concerned about their children because they are safely ensconced in places into which money is poured — money that is taken from working people.

A large section of the population now see the Government for precisely what they are. The polls show that parents, and the vast majority of LEAs and political parties, will not tolerate what is happening to our education system.

When I heard of the new name coming in to take the place of the Secretary of state when he goes it sounded like the Hammer house of horror. It sounded appalling. I would be shocked beyond measure if the present Minister of State became the Secretary of State. I have heard some of the Minister's speeches and he would be far worse than the present Secretary of State, or indeed previous Secretaries of State. I hope that somewhere on the Conservative Benches there may be someone with some compassion for the children of our country but I doubt it.

The Secretary of State should go, and he should go now. He has wreaked havoc in the education system for long enough. He should not be allowed to do so for another year or 18 months. If the polls are right, I hope you lot go with him.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has had a good blaze away at the Government and these Benches. I did not hear him say much about the teachers' pay dispute which has dominated the proceedings of the past 12 months, but I should like to say a few words about it.

I welcome the fact that ACAS, at long last, is involved in the dispute. Some of us advocated that ACAS should have been involved last June. At that time, ACAS was ready to intervene with a panel of experts to try to help. If the ACAS panel can steer a way out of the problems, ACAS must then become part of the future pay structure. That new approach will have to be institutionalised, because we cannot go back to the old Burnham system which led us to the present difficulties.

ACAS has said that, as well as the unions, individual teachers and groups of teachers can put their views to the panel. I hope the teachers will not simply rely on their union's point of view. The way is now clear for individual teachers — they said a lot to us as Back-Bench Conservatives about how their dispute should be solved —to put their views to the ACAS panel.

Management allowances should be built into the system of teachers' pay. This would pay them for non-teaching duties. The Government are keen to improve good practice on homework. The blunt truth is that, in many homes, it is impossible for children to do their homework—many should do their homework at school. That would inevitably require supervision and such management duties of teachers could be built into the pay which they would receive.

On 16 January 1986, in an article in The Times about management and improving quality, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked:

"'Does your firm positively encourage staff to go back to college to keep in front of the technologies'".

The question that should be asked is, does a school positively encourage teachers to go into industry for a short time to find out more of what industry wants? If we could build into the system a policy whereby it is regular practice for teachers to have a sabbatical in industry it would be another way in which their pay could be improved.

With the fall in inflation, the way ought to be clear for ACAS to obtain a three-year deal on teachers' pay. We do not want an annual row. The present economic conditions would enable us to move towards a three-year pay deal. The future of the education service desperately requires peace and stability in the teaching profession. I cannot think of any organisation better than ACAS to help steer the parties out of the present impasse.

The Government have a very useful legislative power in the Education (Grants and Awards) Act 1984 to strengthen the curriculum in specific subjects. I sometimes wish that the Government would draw more attention to the power that they have wisely taken. With the popularity of TVEI and with certain subjects becoming more popular, the Government may need to extend that power. There is an advantage in that for teachers, and they should seize it. Given the new specific subjects that are more popular, and the existing subjects, such as modern languages, that need to be strengthened, the extra money available through education support grants would have an implication for transfer of manpower. Teachers should not turn down that opportunity.

I share the hope of my hon. Friend the Minister of State that the GCSE will start on schedule. With continuous assessment built into the new system and with the Government's correct emphasis on more practical work, there will be yet another opportunity for teachers. Numbers will have to increase to ensure that the GCSE functions properly. The practical side will also mean more staff. That, therefore, represents an opportunity for teachers, and carries with it expenditure implications that the Government are no doubt aware of. Incidentally, I commend the work of British School Technology in helping local education authorities to overcome staff shortages and to update their equipment and resources cost-effectively. It has been going only 18 months, but I am sure that the Government will continue to support that valuable work.

I turn to the partnership between Government, local education authorities and parents. Much is said about parental involvement but one must first have parental interest in what is going on. It should be the norm that the cost of running each school, with the salaries, books, equipment, heating, lighting and so on, is automatically made available to parents. They should not have to go and get the information. The local education authority should ensure that parents know exactly what is going on. The Government rightly say that they have done much through the Education Act 1980, and have given parents more choice. But that Act should be applied more enthusiastically. If it was, some schools would close because parents would vote with their feet. It still worries me that education authorities do not remind parents sufficiently strongly that under that Act there are choices and an appeal system. If parents were reminded more, some of the problems of falling rolls might be more easily overcome.

Parental interest will start to disappear if there are endless upheavals in the way that the education system is organised. We should have a firmer commitment to improving what we already have. Particular attention should be paid to the growing popularity of sixth-form colleges. That, of course, carries implications for school sixth forms. We must remember, too, the growing problem for schools of educating children when many more of them come from single-parent families. I cannot go into the detail now, but we all know the special problems that that brings.

The Government have pressed for higher standards and greater opportunities, and that carries with it expenditure implications. It is not the other way round. Pressure for more spending comes because the very things that the Government believe in and are doing imply an inevitable increase in expenditure. For example, as standards in schools increase as the Government want, the expenditure implications for science subjects are inevitable. The Government rightly say that the unemployed should use the education service for retraining, but that carries a spending implication. The same is true of adult education.

In Saturday's edition of The Times I noticed two interesting statements. The first says:

"Ministers are expected to agree to give universities more money to prevent closures."

Many of us would heartily agree with that. The article continues:

"The Government is clearly worried about education spending. Mr. John MacGregor, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, told officials last week that education was now one of the top priorities for ministers and the Conservative Party. The clear implication is that it must not be cut further."

If the Government continue to get out of things that they should get out of—such as the gas, telephone and motor car industries—they will be free to concentrate on the very things that Governments do best, such as education.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been a good political friend to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the general Cabinet effort to keep state spending reasonable. But in 1986 there should be some reciprocity. Reciprocity from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be of great benefit to the education service.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South (Mr. Madel) and I worked together during the last Parliament on the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts, and I know of his commitment to education policy. I hope that the Government listened to his plea for the continuing centrality of public sector education provision. However, I have my doubts about that.

Those of us who have been involved in education and education policy were not surprised when the Minister of State took a text from the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). Those of us concerned with education policy were dismayed by that famous Ruskin speech. It was the beginning of the instrumentalist approach to education policy. It was the beginning of the narrowing of the curriculum base. It was the beginning of considering education in narrow economistic terms. It was the beginning of the end of the broad-based liberal, humanistic curriculum in our schools. Consequently, as happened so often under that Labour Government, the foundation stones of Thatcherism were laid. Indeed, some of the ideological bases of Thatcherism were laid down by that Government. I say that more in sorrow than in anger, looking at what has happened since.

In this short debate, it is essential to take account of the immediate issues facing us and of the industrial dispute going on in our schools. I hope to do that before the end of my remarks, but first I shall take up the Ruskin approach —if not the Ruskin content—of the Minister of State. We should question the Government's insistence on an employment-led curriculum. The Government argue that in a rapidly changing technological society we need a curriculum that enables pupils to adapt to it. But they also argue that the curriculum must be determined by employers and by the needs of industry on a very short-term assessment of those needs. That is contradictory. Surely a relevant education for a rapidly changing society must be broad-based. The curriculum should emphasise not only the technical skills but the key social skills, as well as an understanding of the very complex nature of our society. That can be provided only through a broad-based curriculum in our schools and through continuing educational provision, for which we have already heard such a strong appeal.

That approach is very different from the reintroduction of the concept of the secondary modern school through MSC intervention in our schools and the TVEI programme, which apparently represent the Government's approach. An emphasis on enterprise culture might be welcomed. But such an emphasis must ensure that all kids understand it and understand that it is not something that involves de-skilling. Indeed, many of us fear that that will be the result of the Government's continuing intervention at the 14-plus level through the restoration of secondary modern education via the back door.

As we look at the Government's intervention we see the need to redress the balance to see relevance—again, one of the Government's key words—in terms of a social relevance, not in terms of blaming the education system for the failures of the British economy, as so many Government spokespersons seem to be doing. The idea that education is the cause of the failures of society is nothing new for those of us who have studied the sociology and history of education. Whenever there is social crisis, the education system is always attacked as the cause of —or at least for not being sufficiently active in solving —that particular crisis.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth was a typical example of the castigating of education for the economic and social failures and crisis under his Government.

Mr. Chris Patten: Read it.

Mr. Thomas: I read it carefully and I have read analyses of it and I understand the role of the speech within the education policy of Labourism which was perpetrated by that right hon. Gentleman, and as the beginnings of the surrender of the Labour movement's education policy to Black Paper thinking. I hope that those days are over but there is a continuing argument over an education policy based upon notions of equality and broad curriculum, which we need to deploy. I know that the Minister does not like that because he wants to inherit the mantle of the Black Paperists but there are those of us in the House whose commitment to education is a commitment to a broad-based curriculum, not to an instrumental curriculum, who would accept many of the arguments about the need for an enterprise culture but who would regard that as being part of a broad-based curriculum, not a replacement for it.

In our education debates we need to reiterate the basic values of education policy which my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) put over so forcibly. The approaches of the Schools Council and the "Practical Curriculum" document are still the most relevant — again, I know, that is not acceptable to Conservative Members — with an emphasis upon the acquisition of knowledge, skills and practical abilities; the development of qualities of mind, body, spirit, feeling and imagination; the appreciation of human achievement; the acquiring and understanding of social skills, values and beliefs; the preparation of pupils for adult life at home, at work, at leisure and at large as consumers and citizens; and finally, and most importantly, to develop a sense of self-respect and capacity to live as independent self-motivated adults and the ability to function as contributing members of co-operative groups. Those were the aims laid down in the "Practical Curriculum" and quoted in detail in the Warnock report. Those aims apply to the whole of our curriculum and should continue to apply. Those who seek to narrow the curriculum are de-skilling our pupils and narrowing their education and employment opportunities in later life.

When the captains of industry are asked what they need of education policy, that, in my experience, reveals at best an ill-informed approach and at worst a narrow view of the kind of people that they expect to come to them. There is a lack of understanding of the way in which a broad-based education curriculum can contribute to the training of the work force and the skilling of a broader society.

The Minister made the point that a fair and sensible deal for teachers was the key to resolving the present impasse in the education service. He must understand that what the teachers have been involved in, and the NUT in particular, has been an attempt to defend the professional integrity of teaching against the attack on it by the Government, not merely in their ideological attack on the curriculum, to which I have referred, but also in their attack on the professional integrity of teachers through the low pay, and their attack on the very notion of their ability as professionals, which is behind the assessment approach.

The assessment approach is not about good or bad teachers; it is about undermining the professionalism and independence of the teaching profession. So too is the Government's drive to centralise education. I remember well when I first came to the House the bleating from the shire counties against the abolition of the direct grant schools and the spreading of comprehensive education under the previous Labour Government. The policy of comprehensivisation was attacked by the shire counties because it was an intervention in local democracy; an interference with the rights of local authorities. Now we hear the Minister, in Cardiff of all places, making his famous "yob" speech in which he attacked the notion of a local education service and threatened local education authorities with a central state takeover. [HON MEMBERS: "Read it."] Of course I have read it. I read all his utterances avidly. That is typical of the Government's approach, as is their centralist assessment of teachers.

I want to express my anxiety, not just about the Government's approach to the exclusion of the NUT from the ACAS talks, but about the approach of the Labour-controlled authorities. Here again I am afraid that I must say that some of the Labourism which appeared in the speech of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth at Ruskin still survives in some Labour-controlled education authorities. It is appalling that through possible collusion—I do not know through which channels—the Labour-led employers put pressure on ACAS to prevent the NUT from taking part in the current talks. Clearly, without the inclusion of that major trade union in the teaching profession there can be no settlement. That must be recognised by the Labour-controlled authorities, the Government and ACAS. There must be open talks on an open agenda, including the NUT, if there is to be an end to the present dispute.

In reality the dispute continues. Many members of unions other than the NUT are equally alienated, although officially they are supposed to have resumed so-called normal duties, but the deal that ACAS offered in January did not change the low pay of the teaching profession. There was no attempt to bring about relative parity. As long as we have a level of pay that is inadequate given the emphasis we all place on education in our society, there will be no solution to the present dispute. There is more pressure on the teaching service now from all directions. There is more need for in-service training and the development of professional skills. Surely, at this time more than at any other, we need a recognition in the level of pay of the quality of service being provided for our society by teachers.

Therefore, I make a plea to the Labour-led authorities on the Burnham committee to ensure that the NUT is allowed to the table in the talks with ACAS.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: As I understand it, the employers at a meeting today have made proposals for further talks with the NUT on that point.

Mr. Thomas: I am deeply pleased if that is the case and I hope that that reflects a change of heart on the part of the Labour-controlled education authorities.

The dispute that has brought about deep divisions within the teaching profession and the education service during the past one and a half years is a result of the attack on the education service by the Government. There has been a defence of that service by the teaching unions, and I want to pay tribute to the teachers who have defended it. They are defending not only their own professionalism, but the values of education and the sort of values that we need in our education service if we are to maintain a broad-based provision for future society.

6.30 pm

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): This is the first occasion for some time that I have attended an education debate. There has been a clear contrast between the wholly unfounded accusations of the Opposition, especially the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), and the clear and precise answers and the resolution behind the Government's approach portrayed by my hon. Friend the Minister.

I fully support the amendment standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The Government are tackling the long-standing problems in our schools—the curricula, examinations, teacher training and motivation and methods of assessing the performance of teachers. The Minister and Conservative Members must repeat over and over again, to the country at large, the achievements of our Government in education.

I am tempted to talk about some of the achievements in our schools in Scotland, not least the introduction of the standard grade, which is not narrowing the syllabus or the examination possibilities but providing better choice for pupils in line with their ability. Every pupil in Scottish schools will, as part of a compulsory core curriculum, study arithmetic, English and science, and will be assessed according to his ability in each subject.

I wish today to talk especially about higher education and especially about student grants. I well understand the Government's desire to bring the United Kingdom more into line with the systems in other countries. My generation depended almost entirely on parental support and part-time student jobs. Today, our grant system is one of the most generous in the world. However, the expectation of state financial support is also now at its highest in education, as it is in other areas. Most people expect grants to meet the full cost of university and college life. Others believe—and this constantly surprises me—that students should not have to find part-time jobs to make ends meet. With unemployment being so high, it is not difficult for students to claim that there are not many part-time jobs available. However, I believe that that depends on the area. For example, in Edinburgh there are many part-time jobs available for students.

Nevertheless, we cannot simply brush aside those high expectations or, indeed, the Government's obligations that many people, including Conservatives, believe we must continue to meet.

Because of the difficulties with student finance, I recently attended a meeting of the principals of the two universities and the various colleges in Edinburgh. The principals, whose opinions I greatly respect, earnestly believe that many of their students are suffering hardship. As a result of that meeting, I received a letter from the student accommodation service, which the principals had asked it to prepare, referring to student finances. There is not time for me to read much of it to the House, but one interesting part states:

> "The Royal Bank of Scotland and the Bank of Scotland have indicated that up to 30 per cent. of their student account holders are overdrawn at any one time, and clearly with 25 per cent. to 30 per cent. being overdrawn at any one time the absolute number of students going into debt with the banks over the course of their university career is much greater."

The encouraging point is that many students are prepared to incur bank loans or overdrafts to enable them to meet their university obligations. But—and this is the view of the principals—other students, perhaps because of background or home life, do not have the capacity to take advantage of bank financing. The principals believe that the Government should provide a loan scheme to encourage those students, many of whom are suffering serious hardship, to top up their grants with loans.

The students are falling between two stools — the Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of Education and Science. I should like the DES to take on responsibility for all student finance with the DHSS coming out of the act. No matter how closely Departments work, true love departmentally in Whitehall is never so deep that the customers of the service are not likely to suffer to some extent as Departments quite naturally try to reduce their expenditure.

I plead with my right hon and hon. Friends to look again at student financing and to consider bringing forward a scheme, perhaps of mixed grants and loans, so that student finance can be put on a more sound footing than at present. I hope that we can look forward to the day when DHSS support will come out of the system altogether.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Before replying to the debate on behalf of the alliance, I wish to declare an interest as an adviser to the Association of University Teachers.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) added a Scottish dimension to the debate.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

Several of my Scottish hon. Friends have been present during the debate because, of course, the Secretary of State's baleful influence is not confined to England and Wales—it extends into Scotland both directly in relation to higher education and indirectly through the length of time that it took to reach a settlement in Scotland because of the pressures emanating from England and the attempts to hold off a settlement.

There have been a number of valuable and interesting contributions to the debate. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) for his strong support of our criticisms. The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) is somewhat of a wolf in sheep's clothing—he purports to support the Government while all the time urging them to adopt more and more of the sort of Right-wing policies that in the past have been condemned by the Minister.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) made a characteristic and vigorous attack on the Government. I found it unusually difficult to find a point of disagreement with him. The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) underlined the public expenditure needs of education, and made an appropriate reference to the need to spend the money wisely and sensibly. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) spoke about the philosophical issues, and it would have been nice to have had more time to reflect upon them, but the debate has been, unfortunately, compressed.

A notable absence in the debate was a contribution from the Secretary of State, who has been present throughout. The right hon. Gentleman is never wanting in courtesy. It is extraordinary that he should have been silenced—I know not by whom. He has set aside time to be present at the debate, but has been stopped from saying anything in defence of himself. I cannot believe that that is his choice, as it would be too much out of character. He has been compelled to silence.

There was a wonderful picture in one of our newspapers showing the way in which he conducted himself during the last election. He attended election meetings, savouring the arguments as he always does, seizing the microphone and setting out among the audience asking them questions and engaging in debate. He was described as looking like a cross between Socrates and Des O'Connor. He would have relished that role today, but he now looks more like Diogenes with the barrel firmly nailed down as someone seeks to prevent him from playing any useful part in our proceedings.

Instead, today we had the contribution of the Minister of State who, interestingly, took as his text of the day not anything said by the Secretary of State but the speech of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). I think that he was a little frightened of taking anything from the Secretary of State as his text.

When the hon. Gentleman and I were co-operating on literary enterprises, especially the financially unprofitable ones, he said in a book about the Tory case:

> "Education has been at the heart of the political and ideological debate in the last 15 or 20 years. There has been change and confusion, and there are many on the Left, and a few on the libertarian Right, who are keen to see another period of upheaval. This could not possibly be to the advantage of our education system."

There are no doubts about to whom he was referring, because he then spoke about

> "those who are more representative of the Liberal than the Tory strain in modern Conservatism, like Sir Keith Joseph"

That is the type of posture that he has always cultivated.

At present, I think he sees himself hoping to emerge eventually as Secretary of State for Education rather as a sort of Juan Carlos when the generalissimo goes. Having been tutored under the former regime, he comes out with education as safe in his hands as democracy is in the hands of the estimable monarch, whom we look forward to greeting in this country later this week. But he will not be able to keep education safe in his hands. He is really rather like Baby Doc taking over from Papa Doc, already attaching himself, as he did in his Cardiff speech, to some of the more lunatic notions favoured on the Right of his own party, such as Crown schools and central control—the possibility of looking at what is wrong with the education system and taking over the parts that are not going well centrally.

One valuable group of the centrally provided part of the education system is Her Majesty's inspectors of education, but the Government have failed to respond to their steady criticisms of what under-financing is doing to key parts of the education system. I know of no evidence anywhere to suggest that the taking over by the Department of Education and Science of anything currently done by local government would result in any net benefit.

Since my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) concentrated on the schools issue, I will refer to higher education. A series of cuts in higher education began in 1981 when there was the famous trio of measures hitting Aston, Bradford and Salford. The cuts varied between 31 per cent. and 44 per cent. and hit at the very technological area of our higher education system which the Government had claimed to favour improving.

Universities generally have continued to face a 1½ per cent. cut per year in real terms in funding. The chairman of the University Grants Committee has pointed out that the cuts threaten the closure of three or four universities. I understand the trend of his argument. He does not want constant under-funding to result in a general lowering of standards; that is why the stark option of closure is raised. As the Secretary of State said about the proposals of the National Advisory Body, he may also say that in this case the statements are inaccurate—that they are rubbish. How else is the system to respond to the steady reduction in crucial funding? What has happened over recent years is that under-funding of the university sector has led to a slack in student numbers being taken up by the polytechnics, but at the price of a 25 per cent. worsening in the staff-student ratio and a 20 per cent. reduction in financing per student. The Council for National Academic Awards has warned that if this policy continues it will not be able to sustain at acceptable levels the quality of courses it evaluates.

Mr. Henderson rose——

Mr. Beith: I will not give way, as I am restricted in time and have given the Minister an undertaking of the time at which I shall sit down.

It is apparent from the NAB letter that two polytechnics will lose their engineering courses, with Wolverhampton losing all its courses and Sunderland losing its civil engineering course. Two polytechnics will lost their modern language programmes, an area in which we desperately need a more systematically directed kind of teaching to meet the needs of exporting industries and other international areas. Several further education colleges will lose all their advanced work, and many mergers are being requested.

It is a very depressing picture, and at the same time an opportunity is being wasted. A 14 per cent. reduction in demand for higher education is predicted by 1996. An opportunity therefore existed to expand lifelong education and to widen the opportunity of people to get back into education through the higher education system, something which, I understand, industry very much wants. At the same time there has been the demoralising of university teachers, whose salaries are down by 24 per cent. from the 1979 level. The measures on overseas students have cut off from this country many students from the poorest countries who are most in need of our help.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) said in 1983 that he thought cuts affecting overseas students had gone too far, yet the situation has worsened. There is also the reduction in the real value of the grant for students. Travel allowances have been cut and the housing benefit and supplementary benefit have been reduced. In the present economic climate, no alternative is available to students to supplement their income, because jobs are simply not available.

The main charges against the Secretary of State are that he has failed to achieve even his own objectives, such as strengthening the numbers of good teachers and removing inadequate teachers from the system, and increasing the emphasis on technology and science. Other goals which the rest of us did not want but which the right hon. Gentleman wanted have also not been achieved, such as the loan system, except by the back door in that case by student overdrafts, a matter referred to by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central. There was also the case for increased parental contribution, on which the Secretary of State was defeated.

So he has not achieved his own objectives. He has failed to provide leadership. I often feel that he thinks he is or wishes he was the Chancellor. If the Chancellor does not impose sufficient cuts on his Budget, the right hon. Gentleman pleads for more cuts, rather than fighting for what the education system needs. He has entirely lost the confidence of all those involved in education, at the levels of higher education, further education, the schools, and the GCSE. The Government's amendment says that the Government are only beginning to address the issues involved, yet they have been in government for seven years.

One thing that can be said about the Secretary of State is that he has never been unwilling to recognise when he has been wrong. In one case, he even said that he had been something of a semi-Socialist because of his consent to levels of public expenditure. He admitted that he was wrong in the direction given on tower blocks and that scale of housing. He admitted that he was wrong over National Health Service reorganisation, when he produced the vast, cumbersome and undemocratic reorganisation that he has been dismantling ever since. It is now time that he admitted that he has been wrong on education. How long must we wait for this? How long must the education system linger under the difficulties that it now faces?

The right hon. Gentleman enjoys a great deal of respect and affection in this House, but it is for his qualities as a debater, polemicist and advancer of ideas, qualities that he has not been allowed to demonstrate today. For those qualities, and not for qualities of leadership or for inspiring confidence in the education system, he is respected in this House. I do not seek to detract in any way from the respect in which he is held, but that is not respect for the special qualities presently required if our education system is to recover.

The hon. Member for Bath was very much out of touch with the real anger that exists about the present state of education. The Secretary of State must recognise that the system needs new confidence and leadership. It is a mark of wisdom to know when the time has come to hand over to someone else. I hope that the Secretary of State will show that wisdom and in the meantime I invite the House to reject the Government's complacent amendment and support our motion.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said at the beginning of the debate, the Government welcome this short debate proposed by the alliance. Education is a major Government priority, and we are gratified to see the alliance following us on to this ground, as in so many other areas, albeit in a rather limping, wary and halting way. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), with his usual curious emphasis on materialism, accused my right hon. Friend of being a monetarist, but the hon. Member for Durham, North talks of nothing but money. Nothing illustrates so well the decline of interest by the Labour party in educational standards, as the Minister of State so rightly pointed out, as the speech of the hon. Member for Durham, North.

We then had the usual stuff about cuts in higher education, with no mention of the fact that the total number of people in higher education in this country is at a record high, with 80,000 more students now than when we came to office in 1979. No mention at all was made of the age participation index, yet no debate on this subject would be complete without such a reference. Both the API and the qualified participation index are at record levels; both have increased remarkably since the Government came to office. Not surprisingly, the hon. Member for Durham, North also tried to revive last week's dead hare about so-called cuts in polytechnics. We need say no more about that, because a similar hare was set running several months ago when it was said that there would be cuts of either 18,000 or 20,000—perhaps the exact figure does not matter. There are now to be cuts of 10,000. I make it clear that the Government have made no such proposals.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Walden: No, I shall not. I do not have enough time to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

The National Advisory Body committee has not made any such recommendations to the Government.

Fortunately, as relief from all that, we had a typically incisive speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey). My only complaint about his speech is that my hon. Friend failed to draw attention to the more entertaining aspects of the speech of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) in Stirling some time ago. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman referred to Professor Leibenstein, who has developed something called an X-efficiency system. It seems to mean that higher education, as with other parts of education, should seek to do more with less. The right hon. Gentleman had to go as far as Minnesota and Arizona to find examples of that. I suggest that he examines the university and polytechnic system in Britain in the light of the Government's recent record. That system is managing to do much more with the same.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): With fewer resources.

Mr. Walden: That is the only quibble that I have with the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth.

I shall not dwell on the contribution of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). His was a voice from another age, and a rather rancid voice at that. There was all the stage talk about struggle, working people and the rest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), in a typically thoughtful and constructive speech, talked about what he would like to see developed for homework and TVEI. I hope that my hon. Friend will not forget in his talk of teachers' management duties in respect of homework that there is a management duty on parents, which seems fundamental.

The thoughtful remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West on TVEI will be taken into account when we are considering extending the lessons of TVEI for all secondary schools. I noted his argument on the economics of education, which was vastly more sophisticated than any of those advanced by Opposition Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) spoke about student grants in a reasoned contribution. He talked about the high expectations of students, and said that we should be encouraging realistic expectations rather than perpetuating the perhaps over-high expectations of the past. My hon. Friend quoted some evidence of hardship. I am always keen to see this evidence and I hope that he will write giving me the details. Everyone else is writing to me and there is no reason why my hon. Friend should not do so.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) rounded off the debate for the Liberal party. Having heard his summing up, I am not much wiser than I was at the beginning of the debate. The hon. Gentleman mentioned difficulties in respect of overseas students. I am sure that he has seen the recent figures, which make it clear that the fallback in the number of overseas students is being reversed in the most encouraging way. We are not engaged in a competitive debate on the value of having overseas students in Britain.

I shall make some general remarks about the state of education because much nonsense has been uttered during the debate. Unfortunately, we do not have time in these debates for a more considered discussion of the issues. Some of the latest nonsense concerns universities, and I wish to make the Government's position clear. I have read the speculative article to which some hon. Members have referred. Hon. Members will recall that, in its strategy document, the UGC said that there might be circumstances in which phasing out grant to a certain number of universities might be the least damaging way of solving the problems of the university system. However, the UGC has not made any recommendations to that effect, let alone named individual institutions. The Government naturally keep the funding of universities under review. As is known, the UGC is currently studying how available funds should best be distributed.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Walden: No, I shall not. I do not have time to do so.

I assure the House that any questions affecting the future of universities will be given the closest possible attention by the Government in the light of all relevant circumstances.

Mr. Bennett rose——

Mr. Walden: I shall bring my remarks to an end with a few general observations on the education system. I hope that the whole House will recognise that education is in a state of creative ferment at all levels. It is natural that, at this historical moment, professors, teachers, students and sometimes, for reasons which Opposition Members will understand best of all, children can undergo a difficult period. Let us not forget that the opposite of ferment is stagnation and decline and that we cannot afford complacency in the education system any more than we can contemplate any continued complacency in our economy. In other words, we cannot have a country in which there are high expectations in welfare and low expectations in education.

Despite what some Opposition Members have said about standards, worry about low expectations recurs repeatedly in HMI reports, and that should worry all hon. Members of whatever party affiliation. As I am responsible more for higher education than for schools, I shall give the House some idea of how the problem might affect my sector of the education system.

British higher education is among the best in the world, but I am not sure that we can say the same for our schools, and that has not been said throughout the debate. The following question naturally arises: how long can British higher education remain the best in the world if we do not do something about education standards in our schools, which many Opposition Members as well as my hon. Friends must know are often inadequate? It seems that more regard and more praise should be given to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for initiating what will be seen in future as a historic series of reforms. There is a comprehensive policy of reform at every level of the education system.

Education must be made more relevant to business. At the same time it is most important that the humanities and the arts should continue to be valued in future as they have been in the past. I remind hon. Members that the Government's strategy to secure higher standards covers all subjects, whether they are arts or science subjects. It was put to me recently by an eminent member of a university that it is true that entry into a university science department can be usefully opened to arts graduates as well, so the point has added validity.

I wish to stress the coherence and thorough-going nature of the programme of reforms that has been initiated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It is designed to bring education closer to industry and to raise standards across the board. I contrast with that the incoherence of the alliance's approach, which has been highlighted in the debate. The alliance wants access to higher education but at the same time it is busy closing grammar schools whenever it is able to do so. These schools would offer access to those most in need of it.

I invite the House to reject this rather shoddy and indecent motion.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd and
Mr. Peter Lloyd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the education policies being pursued by Her Majesty's Government, which are beginning to tackle the urgent need to raise and sustain educational standards at all levels of ability, to create a wider range of opportunities for young people, and to enable the educational system to make its full and proper contribution to national life.

Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

BAN ON EXPORTS

'No animals may be exported for the purposes of experimentation or related scientific procedures except with the specific approval of the Secretary of State.'.—[Mr. Gale.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.15 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take New clause 2—Ban on imports—

'No animals may be imported for the purpose of experimentation or related scientific procedures except with the approval of the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Gale: New clause 1 was tabled in my name. However, because of an error on the Amendment Paper it appears in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims). He did not table this new clause and wishes that to be on record. The clause says that:

"No animals may be exported for the purposes of experimentation or related scientific procedures except with the specific approval of the Secretary of State."

It seeks to give animals exported for laboratory use the same or similar protections as those afforded under this excellent piece of legislation to animals that will in future be used in the United Kingdom until alternatives are found which obviate the necessity to use animals.

The fundamental principles behind the Bill are that no unnecessary experiments of any kind should be carried out in the United Kingdom, good care should be taken of those animals which are used in laboratories for any purpose and, subject to the pain clause, any experimentation shall be terminated at a given point. Throughout the passage of the Bill we have said that, while we wish to see an end to animal experimentation, the majority of us, on both sides of the House, accept the reality that animals will be used in some experiments for the foreseeable future until alternatives are found through research. That being so, we have gone on to say that we believe that there is no morality in banning certain experiments simply to push them overseas where they will be carried out under less favourable conditions than in this country. To do that would not be an act of bravery, but an act of political cowardice.

The Liberal and Social Democratic parties said in Committee that there have been certain experiments that they would like to obviate. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), who is in his place, made the same point on Second Reading. There was consensus throughout the Committee that, unless there are genuine alternatives, we would rather see experiments carried out in this country than anywhere else in the world simply because we believe that this legislation will afford the best possible protection for the foreseeable future. The legislation is flexible and it will, therefore, afford the best possible protection to the animals.

If there is no morality in seeking to push experimentation overseas by banning it here, the implication must be that we seek to offer the same protection to laboratory animals worldwide that we seek to offer in the United Kingdom. Therefore, I believe that to permit the export of animals where we have the power to prevent it—which may not be possible in every case—would be as immoral as driving the experimentation to other countries.

There are those who would say that we should not permit the export of laboratory animals at all. We have control over the breeding laboratories in this country and we accept that animals have to be bred in those laboratories for use in this country. Why should we then permit the export of that product? If we are realistic, we must admit that there are certain cases in which, for the forseeable future, until alternatives become available, it will be necessary to permit the export of live animals. For example, there is the work overseas of the Medical Research Council—research into the effects of the tsetse fly and into river blindness and other tropical diseases. On occasion, that work requires the use of specially bred laboratory rats and mice. Are our own scientists working in the field in Africa to be placed at a disadvantage because we are unable or unwilling to allow them to use the animals that they would be able to use if they were carrying out the same research in the United Kingdom? I think not.

There are also limited cases of parallel experimentation. A laboratory in France, for instance, may be carrying out research into disease in parallel with a university laboratory in this country. If the results of the two experiments are to be compatible, it may be necessary to use the same strain of animal. In that case, the animals must come from the same batch and the same laboratory. In those circumstances, there is again a clear case for permitting the export of animals.

It is not only desirable but necessary that the Home Secretary should have the right and the power to control the export of animals. He should be able to require to see a project licence awarded by the committee, just as a project licence will have to be awarded in this country under the new legislation. Unless the Home Secretary is satisfied that the purposes for which the animals are to be used are reputable, and that they will be treated with satisfactory care on arrival, he should simply not grant an export licence.

I had hoped that after I tabled my amendment the Government would table their own. I am acutely aware that that Back-Bench draftsmanship may leave something to be desired, and that what one seeks to achieve through a simple amendment may turn out to be legally impossible. Proposals made in the House sometimes conflict with international law. I hope that that is not so in this instance. If it is, I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to make plain his support for the principle behind the amendment and his willingness, through additional regulations such as he has already framed in a number of other cases, to implement the spirit of the new clause, if not the letter.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I echo the sentiments expressed by the hon Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), and hope that the Minister will accept the new clause. I am sure that he appreciates what the hon. Gentleman has said and what is expected of us by the people of this country. We hope that no animal will be imported into, or exported from, this country to be used in an experiment which the Secretary of State is not satisfied will inflict no unnecessary pain. I hope that there will be no wholesale exportation and no loopholes in the legislation that might lead people to believe that money could be made out of the breeding of animals for export and experimentation. The sentiments in the new clauses should be universally accepted. I hope that the Minister will accept them and will make it clear in the Bill that the Secretary of State has control over both the import and the export of animals for experimentation. The new clauses have the support of the alliance.

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): I strongly support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). Those who support the Bill and those who have reservations about it are in agreement about the breeding of animals and the licensing of premises from which animals for experimentation are acquired. If we control the breeding establishments used to produce animals used in experimentation, we must make sure that there are no loopholes whereby such animals can be imported from places where there are no licensing arrangements. Breeding establishments in this country can be controlled only if there is an effective control over the import of animals from elsewhere.

All those who are not total anti-vivisectionists will agree that there is a necessity for a proper scientific trade in specific genetic strains to be sent — especially for purposes of research into tropical diseases—to the Curie institute and other establishments. One of the major suppliers of such animals is Bantin and Kingman, a firm with a high reputation for producing extraordinarily carefully selected strains which are essential for research at the Curie institute and in many other places in Europe and elsewhere. The ability of that firm to supply the scientific world with research animals of the highest quality should not be impaired, but I do not believe for a moment that the Government's adherence to new clause 1 or new clause 2 would inhibit the proper trade in scientific research animals.

There is one area about which I would be in doubt were it not for the new clauses. I ask the Minister to convince the House that, without the new clauses, there is any protection other than the Ministry of Agriculture regulations for animals in transit. The House has for many years sought to ensure that cattle, sheep, horses and other animals are adequately foddered and cared for when in transit across the Channel and into this country. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure us that, whether or not the new clauses are accepted, there is completely adequate control over the final destination of exported animals, the provenance of imported animals, and the conditions of transit.

Hon. Members do not relish the trade in animals for experimentation. No one would wish a single rat, mouse or dog to be removed a thousand miles in order to be put to death in an experiment except under the most humane conditions. It is the deep desire of both sides of the House and the sentiment that lies behind new clauses 1 and 2 that imported and exported animals should be subject to the most rigorous control, whence they came, whither they go and how they are treated in transit. The Opposition are suspicious of the Bill as it stands and will continue to be so unless such a guarantee of control can be built into the Bill.

I have been thoroughly advised that when—as I hope —the Bill is enacted there may be a shortage of certain primates in this country for our breeding establishments. It may be necessary to curtail useful research into essential medical programmes in some important pharmaceutical and veterinary establishments as there may be a shortage of certain species of primates for such purposes. It may therefore be essential to import animals for that research to continue.

In the realm of tropical medicine it may be that we have animals that could be exported for the benefit of mankind. These animals are important because of their genetic purity, which should not be interrupted and they could be exported to laboratories in other parts of the world. I do not believe that the general import-export licence system currently available is a sufficient safeguard. I therefore support new clause 1 and recommend it to the House. We require an additional safeguard and, unless the Minister can support such additional safeguards, I am reluctant to allow the Bill to proceed to Third Reading.

I am satisfied that, although the import-export trade is not a major part of animal experimentation, it is one which gives significant cause for concern. We must be satisfied that it is not simply because of commercial interests— because a specific firm derives a certain percentage of its profits from such import-export trade — that we move these new clauses. We are moving the clauses because we believe that such trade should be closely regulated. Licensing should be under the ultimate control of the Secretary of State who should, as I have said, be able to control whither, whence and how animals are moved.

The House should look carefully at the further progress of the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): This is an interesting topic and I appreciate the points that have been made from both sides of the House. It is especially interesting because, although, as the House will be aware, a tremendous amount of work ranging far beyond my Department went into the preparation of the Bill, it was not until a late stage in the Committee proceedings that some hon. Members expressed a desire to see the Bill directly applied to the control of the import and export of animals.

That posed the Government difficulties as the normal procedures of consultation were not possible because of the time element involved. I hope that my comments tonight will offer reassurance on a range of points. I will make suggestions for further progress that I hope will be acceptable to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) and the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes).

I cannot recommend the acceptance of either of the new clauses. However, I believe that I can meet the spirit of most of the points raised on these clauses. I would like to echo what the hon. Member for City of Durham said about the high standards of breeding establishments in Britain. Those high standards will be enhanced by one of the principal effects of the Bill which is to bring supplying establishments under control and fully integrated into the Bill.

It must be borne in mind, as the hon. Member for City of Durham implied, that the exportation of animals plays a significant part in the viability of some of the members of the Laboratory Animal Breeders Association from which we have received such helpful co-operation. It estimates that some 1 million animals—mainly rats and mice — are exported and that that earns some £2·5 million per annum. I mention that point to confirm that there is a considerable trade involved—and that is why it is proper that these points should have been raised tonight — and also to emphasise that it is crucial that there are breeding establishments which are capable of being regulated by the Secretary of State.

No one would want to jeopardise the financial viability of these businesses. The only consequence of such action would be that one of the Bill's crucial pillars — the existence of breeding establishments which provide the overwhelming majority of animals used in British laboratories — would be undermined and the regulation of such establishments would be impossible.

There is one point about new clause 1 which I cannot answer satisfactorily. I hope, however, that I will be able to meet all the points raised on new clause 2. I believe that there are two main points in connection with new clause 1. Hon. Members were primarily concerned about the conditions under which animals are transported and the use to which animals are put when they arrive at their destination. There is already a considerable amount of legislation, in connection with the transport of animals. The Transit of Animals (General) Order 1973 is the main legislation, but I should also mention the Conveyance of Live Poultry Order 1973, the Transit of Animals (Road and Rail) Order 1975 and the Export of Animals (Protection) Order 1981. There are also two European Community directives on the subject — 77/489 and 81/389. The first of those contains detailed requirements on all of the animals protected by the Bill. The latter amplifies these requirements for large farm animals and equidae which may be involved in the Bill but probably only to a limited degree. The hon. Member for City of Durham is an expert on such matters and knows more about this than I do.

The regulations cover a multiplicity of details, including the feeding and watering of animals, loading and unloading and the design of accommodation. Over and above these statutory requirements, I understand that the exporting organisations make strenuous efforts to ensure that the animals which are destined for use in scientific or experimental work arrive in good condition. On that point, I believe that further information will inevitably be provided through the processes of the examination of breeding estalishments inherent in the Bill. It would be fitting, as part of imposing the controls under the Bill, that we give consideration to the adequacy of the orders presently governing the transportation of animals and specifically of small animals which form the bulk of exports. If there is a hiatus in the consideration of the redrafting of the rules, I should like, at an early stage, to consider the advice of the animal procedures committee.

I stress that there is no question of a legislative opportunity to do that being lost if the Bill goes through unamended. Such proceedings could be carried out under an order-making power and that is relevant to the point about which the hon. Member for City of Durham sought assurances tonight.

I would like to face with the candour with which I have tried to debate the issue throughout the one difficulty which I cannot meet. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have a duty under the Act to satisfy himself that if animals are bound for the university of Cambridge — or indeed Oxford as I do not want to be pejorative about my old university — they are kept in the best conditions and are used only in the context of procedures that have been properly weighed and balanced under the Act and subject to a project licence that contains all the requirements of the Bill. If, however, they are being exported to the university of Paris or Brussels, with the best will in the world there is no way in which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State can be satisfied as he would be in relation to an institution within the jurisdiction.

I see no easy way around that problem beyond using the influence that we have to ensure that more countries ratify the Council of Europe convention and that there is more pressure within the European bodies for the detailed regulation of care and standards that we shall have set in process by the very act of passing this legislation in the United Kingdom. Once the animals leave our shores, it is very difficult for the Secretary of State realistically to exercise the kind of judgment that he can exercise in the United Kingdom. On transportation, however, I believe that what I have said today represents a considerable move in the direction that hon. Members wish.

On new clause 2, I can give much more comprehensive undertakings. By virtue of the arrangements that we have carried into effect in the Bill, animals not purpose bred in a breeding establishment will either come to that establishment from elsewhere in the United Kingdom or from overseas or, under an exceptional procedure provided for in the Bill, in certain circumstances they will go direct to the registered place. I will deal with the latter point first as it is easiest to dispose of.

For schedule 2 animals imported directly into a scientific procedure establishment, specific authority will be required through the project licence. Under clause 10(3) these animals must be obtained from a designated breeder or supplier unless the Secretary of State considers an exception to be justified and necessary for the purposes of the work in question. The more exotic animals are also covered by endangered species legislation. I am therefore satisfied that the provisions for specific authority in clause 10(3) will enable the Secretary of State not to grant permission if he is dissatisfied with the manner in which the animals are to be imported or has any doubt as to their provenance or quality or the way in which they have been handled.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I presume that the Minister is referring to clause 10(3) (b) which states that the animal must be "bred at a designated breeding establishment or obtained from a designated supplying establishment."

How do the Greeks designate establishments and what power has the Secretary of State over Greek breeding establishments?

Mr. Mellor: I am sorry if I have not got the point across. I am dealing here only with the import of animals direct to a registered place, not to a breeding establishment. Schedule 2 animals must be obtained from a designated breeding establishment unless the Secretary of State is prepared to decree otherwise under the conditions which amendment No. 9 will tighten up, so he will not grant permission if he is in any doubt about the manner in which the animals have been obtained or transported.

When breeding establishments buy in animals, as from time to time they must, we can stop animals coming into those establishments if the conditions in which they are bred or transported adversely affect their welfare or if we think that they will be unsuitable for the research for which they are destined.

The effect of what I have just said is that under the procedures for designating or approving establishments, if the Secretary of State is dissatisfied with regard to the provenance of animals or the manner in which arrangements have been made to import them—in the rare cases, as I suspect, in which the import of these animals is required—such dissatisfaction would be the basis for him to withhold consent for the premises to be registered under the Act. It would also be possible for the Secretary of State to make it a condition of permitting the premises to be registered that no animals are imported into the premises because information has come to him which leads him to think that he cannot be confident of the manner in which it is done.

I believe, therefore, that the matters which are causing concern in relation to importation are dealt with under the existing arrangements and I give the undertaking that our powers will be so used.

With regard to exportation, I believe that I can go a long way towards meeting the point in the manner that I have described. A principal reason why I cannot accept new clause 1 or new clause 2 is that, broadly stated as they are, I am advised that they would be in breach of Community law and liable subsequently to be struck down in the European Court. I should be reluctant to take that course when, due to the subtlety of the mechanism that we have applied elsewhere, I do not believe that we need to go that far.

On that basis, I hope that hon. Members will not seek to press the new clauses.

Mr. Gale: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. I am reassured in part by what he has said, but as he was unable to offer reassurance on the other part of the issue it will not surprise him to know that I am not entirely reassured.

Under clause 7(3), relating to the registration of breeding establishments, the Secretary of State has wide powers and can ask for very specific information. At the very least, I hope that my hon. Friend will now make plain for the record the extreme displeasure with which the Home Secretary would view any breeding establishment thought to be supplying laboratory animals for unsuitable purposes and that that might well be a consideration in the issue, renewal and revocation of licences.

Mr. Mellor: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right to say that that would be a material matter to be borne in mind by the Secretary of State when the issues are weighed up, as they must be, under the powers given by the House to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Gale: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

APPLICATION TO GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

'The provisions of this Act shall apply to projects, premises and personnel in the control of government departments'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Those who support the broad spectrum of the Bill and those who have grave reservations are aware that an area which causes some of the deepest public concern is that of experiments carried out under the direct control and auspices of Her Majesty's Government—the Ministry of Defence, the Home Office, the Ministry of Agriculture or whosoever it may be—and that unless the new clause is accepted an element of Crown immunity will inevitably be involved with this as with most legislation.

I am fully aware that the long-established practice is that Government Departments, through good will, invite Government inspectors in at all times. I am satisfied, however, that the public would be more convinced of the Government's intentions concerning animal welfare if they set their own house in order and said, "We accept a legal responsibility not to do to any animal what we seek to prevent private laboratories doing."

I cannot believe that the public will accept that controls which apply to private pharmaceutical, medical, university or research laboratories or to establishments used to train vets should not apply to the Government. Are we prepared to accept dual standards? If ever I had to debate a proposal concerning which there are dual standards, this is it. I regret that my colleagues are under a two-line Whip. This is a matter of conscience.

We should not provide the Executive with a power which will be imposed differentially. It would be an obscenity of legislation to provide that laboratory animals at Porton Down should have less protection than animals at Cambridge university or the finest pharmaceutical laboratories. An enlightened legislature cannot want that. I accept, however, that current practice is that the Ministry of Defence, for example, allows inspectors in.

I should like to draw attention to what the Minister said in Committee on 25 March. He said:

"The Home Office is given the same access to Government establishments as to all other establishments. It would not expect Crown immunity to be invoked, if proceedings against any person working in those establishments were started."

I accept without demur the good will and bona fides of the Minister and I find it difficult to conceive of a successor who would wish to renege on that. He continued:

"It might be better if there were no Crown immunity, and if it were taken away by the Bill. I have no entitlement to agree to that. I am dealing with matters that are of significance to other Government Departments." — [Official Report, Standing Committee A; 25 March 1986, c. 617.]

I do not ask the Minister to withdraw one jot or tittle.

The current arrangements provide some protection but there is a lacuna, to say the least, in that a benefit to the public must be proven if an experiment is to receive a project licence. I am not satisfied that current arrangements take that into account. If the Ministry of Defence says that an experiment is in the interests of defence, the animals come second, but that parameter is missing from current arrangements. Nothing allows an external body to consider the public good and to balance that good against hurt to the animal.

The House is aware that a minority will find whatever is proposed unacceptable. There is little that we can do about that. I am trying to allay fears that it might not be thought that what is good enough for the goose is good enough for the gander. If the private sector is to be required to have project licences and the rest, it ill behoves the Government to say that they should not have to have such licences.

New clause 3 would make relatively little difference to animal welfare in practice. I hate to put ideas into the Minister's mind, but I believe passionately that the Bill will be perceived to be flawed unless the new clause is added to it.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): New clause 3 plugs a massive loophole. Animal experimentation should not be given Crown immunity. Most people would not want the Government to be in such a privileged position. Experiments conducted at Porton Down, for example, should be done on the same basis as experiments elsewhere.

I want to refer in particular to defence, warfare and wounding experiments. The Minister gave certain assurances in Committee about these matters, but the whole subject should be allowed to come out into the open. I hope that we live in an open and free society, not a closed one. We shall therefore support new clause 3 and hope that the Minister wil accept it.

Mr. Mellor: Crown immunity is one of the oldest parts of the British constitution. It was even around when Lloyd George was responsible for our affairs, and I do not recall that Liberal Governments at that time objected to it. I do not resile from a word of what I said. For myself, I would sweep it away just like that, but I doubt whether that is the basis on which we should do so, given that this is an ad hoc argument on one aspect of a large subject.

My concern is with the practicalities of the issue. In practical terms, Crown immunity makes not a jot or tittle's worth of difference to the practical enforcement of the law. It never has, and I assure the House that it certainly will not in any of our plans. I feel sure that successor Governments will feel precisely the same.

As it happens, it was an interesting exercise for my officials to count the number of premises entitled to claim Crown immunity. We had to count them, because we never thought about it before. We apply the law to premises and do not think that some may be different from others simply because some can claim Crown immunity whereas others cannot. Indeed, I asked my officials to trawl through the records, and they discovered that there is not one instance of any establishment under any Government seeking to invoke Crown immunity.

As much trouble has been taken to get the figures, I am sure that the House will be riveted by them. Of the 447 places registered with the Home Office under the 1876 Act, 124 would be entitled to claim Crown immunity—48 Government establishments, 20 public health laboratories and 56 NHS hospitals and associated research facilities. But none of them do, and I have had clear indications from colleagues since this matter was raised in Committee that no Department has it in mind to claim Crown immunity and that all Departments will abide by the power of the Home Office to inspect and direct what goes on in all these facilities, as is the case with the other 323 that cannot claim immunity.

Porton Down is subject to particularly rigorous scrutiny. The inspection of Porton Down is a personal responsibility of the chief inspector himself. In fact, there is only one apocalyptic reason for the maintenance of Crown immunity, and that is in relation to Porton Down and perhaps one or two other facilities. It is just conceivable in our wildest and most depressive moments that we can think of such an emergency in which work would have to be done that could not be fitted within the Bill and that the invocation of Crown immunity in those wholly exceptional and most unlikely circumstances could be envisaged. For that reason, I suspect that my colleagues are reluctant to contemplate the removal of Crown immunity.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I anticipate that the Minister is just about to sit down and that he will say that he accepts the new clause. Before he does so, will he say whether the Animal Procedures Committee will be able to see the details of the project licence from any of the premises that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. Mellor: I hope that we shall be passing an amendment later which makes it clear that the Animal Procedures Committee will be self-regulating and can determine what work it wishes to do. The purpose of creating an independent Animal Procedures Committee is that if the committee as a whole wills a particular investigation, it should be able to look at any part of the regulations under the Bill.

There may be a case for looking at Crown immunity across the board, but that is for others greater than myself to say. It is not for me to embark on this matter on an ad hoc basis. The real assurance to which the House is entitled—I hope that it has already got both barrels from me—is that the Bill will be enforced in respect of all registered places, whether they are run by the Government or anyone else, without fear or favour and without any exception between any of them on anything other than proper grounds set out in the Bill.

It is for only one purely residual reason that I ask the House to do what even Lloyd George was content with —to retain Crown immunity. It would be exceptional if we sought to remove it tonight. On the basis of the assurances that have been received, I hope that, with their customary wisdom and moderation, the Opposition will not press the matter to a vote.

Mr. Hancock: What the Minister has said leads us all to believe that he should accept the proposal to try to break the mould in relation to Crown immunity. We must start somewhere—why not with a Bill that will give us the first chance in more than 100 years to make any significant changes to animal welfare rights?

An integral part is to remove any ambiguity between the private and public sectors in relation to experiments. The hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) made the point eloquently when he exposed the difference in public perception about what the Bill will achieve — a tightening up of the regulations on the one hand but cloak-and-dagger stuff from the Government on the other.

More than 103,000 experiments—by far the largest number in the country—were carried out last year by various arms of the Government. The Minister referred to 124 establishments. I wonder how easy it will be for hon.

[Mr. Hancock]

Members to get specific details of the experiments that are being carried out? Will there be a relish to answer specific questions?

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington) rose——

Mr. Hancock: I am about to conclude, and the hon. Gentleman will no doubt have his chance to intervene.

The removal of Crown immunity in this one area is a golden opportunity for the Government to show some real enlightenment over animal experiments. It is the one area above all else in which there is widespread public concern about the way in which experiments are conducted in the Ministry of Defence and Government establishments. It is the one area in which such experiments are not readily available to public scrutiny, and I doubt whether they will be in the future, despite the Minister's assurances.

Sir Dudley Smith: I suppose that I had better declare my interest in being involved in the industries affected, just as I declared it on Second Reading and in Committee.

To the best of my knowledge, over many years, the standards operating in Government establishments have been of the highest quality. There have been complaints from time to time, but I do not think that there have been complaints about Governments. I may be wrong, and the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) looks surprised. Government establishments operate at the highest level. While I agree that Crown immunity is puzzling, it has operated for a long time. There appear to be good and adequate reasons for it. If we make an exception in this case, that will surely open up the possibility of changing Crown immunity in many other avenues of legislation. In those circumstances, we would be wise to take the Minister's advice.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I am troubled by the debate, because I think that the time to have another look at Crown immunity is now with us. I accept the Minister's conclusion that it would be a distortion of legislation to address this major constitutional issue—which requires a lot of thought—solely on the basis of this Bill. However, I understand the points made by the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes).

I wish to make a couple of logical points. I have never quite understood how the House can bring itself to trust a Secretary of State—as it must, and as it will do under the Bill—to ensure the welfare of laboratory animals, and say that it does not trust him to look after animals in those institutions for which he is specifically responsible. There is a logical fallacy in what is proposed. Either one trusts the Secretary of State to look after the animals and enforce the provisions of the Bill, or one does not.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend and found that his assurances went a long way. The hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) does not seem to have listened to a word that the Minister said. I noted that the Animal Procedures Committee will be a powerful body, because my hon. Friend said that if it wishes to enter any of the Government experimental institutions it can do so. That is a precedent, because I do not know of a quango that has the power of access to military establishments. I am sure my hon. Friend was on sound ground when he gave the House that assurance. I have a lot of sympathy with the views expressed and with the view of my hon. Friend about Crown immunity. The time has come for it to be examined, but this is not the occasion upon which to do that.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) but I remain unconvinced. The arguments of the Under-Secretary and of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) come up against the difficulty that it is not the same Secretary of State. The Secretary of State for Defence may authorise a procedure and the Secretary of State for the Home Department may not query that without the say-so of the Secretary of State for Defence.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Perhaps the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I think that, in law, "Secretary of State" is a collective term, and for the purposes of enforcement of the statute, one Secretary of State means all Secretaries of State.

Mr. Hughes: I will gladly give way to the Minister if he wishes to assure the House of that.

In law can the Secretary of State give permission for something that he has prohibited? That seems an extraordinary position, because, like Pooh-Bah, with one hat the Secretary of State can allow an experiment to take place at Porton Down and with another hat can turn a blind eye to it because with that hat he can apply Crown immunity. That is absurd. The Under-Secretary of State was almost intellectually limbo dancing, with the bar set rather low. He does not believe there is a case for maintaining Crown immunity in animal experiments, other than that it should be included in the more general rule. That does not apply to hospital kitchens. The Minister says it should be done seriatim but generally, yet within the last five days his own Government have introduced a Bill to remove Crown immunity from hospital kitchens. I see no reason why it should not be done on a general basis.

Mr. Mellor: I understand the point made by the hon. Gentleman. The provision about hospital kitchens was to deal with a specific point where it was thought that hospital prosecutions were not being brought because the prosecuting authorities believed that Crown immunity either could be or perhaps was invoked. I have not been properly briefed on this. I want the House to be clear. My basic defence is that I and all my predecessors have always been sure that the 1876 Act is applied in all registered places, whether Government or other establishments, where work is carried on. That will continue. The problem is not at all similar to the case that the DHSS has to contend with.

Mr. Hughes: There is, where the nature of the problems produces differences. The Minister argued as a point of principle that Crown immunity should not be removed seriatim but should be done on a broad scale. The Bill published by the Government last week about the application of Crown immunity in the Health Service scuppered that argument. Out of 447 establishments, 124 are legally excluded from the provisions of this Bill. That is over a quarter of all establishments. Unless this clause is accepted, those establishments will be excluded. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote for new clause 3.

PROTECTED ANIMALS

Mr. Livsey: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, at end insert

'and invertebrates of the phylum mollusca, class cephalopoda'.

This group includes the octopus family. It is scientifically known as an intelligent group of animals that are experimented upon and that, perhaps, suffer from experimentation. The amendment is in line with the draft EEC directive.

During the Committee proceedings the Minister said that he had an open mind on the subject. These animals have a complex nervous system. Apparently there is no objection by Ministers or officials in the Home Office to an amendment of this kind that covers these animals. The Minister said that he would seek more information on the matter. The amendment applies to octopi and to the giant squid that are used for neuro-physiological experiments. Therefore, I ask the Minister to consider including in the Bill this class of animals.

Mr. Mellor: As I explained in Committee, if and when the Animal Procedures Committee advises me to do so, I shall consider the matter, but not before.

Mr. Livsey: I accept what the Minister said, but when he has heard from the Animal Procedures Committee I hope that there will be a statement on the subject.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the danger is that this sovereign Parliament that is supposed to be deciding what the law should be is deferring a number of decisions to an advisory committee? The hon. Gentleman moved this amendment in Committee, and some of my hon. Friends and I supported him. I am trying to support him again this evening. Does he accept that decisions on the details of the law are the responsibility not of an advisory committee but of this House?

Mr. Livsey: The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) has made a good point. I have listened to what the Minister has said and I have not got a closed mind on the matter. I hope more evidence will be forthcoming.

8.30 pm

Mr. Mellor: In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), may I say that we are in no sense asking the House to allow some advisory committee to take decisions for us. It is a difficult technical question. We do not know the capacity of the species to feel pain. With the greatest respect, a debate between my hon. Friend and myself about the matter would not be worthwhile as it would not be a well informed debate. There is no shame in the House admitting that we are not experts. We have made arrangements for experts to advise us.

Successive Governments have done this and it started with the Littlewood committee. The present Government have twice asked the advisory committee to look at the point and both times it has answered in the negative. I do not think that I would be justified in throwing that advice back in the committee's face. For that reason I made it clear in Committee—I wish to amplify that in reply to my hon. Friend—that I remain of the view that when a specialist body, established by statute to consider these matters, offers positive advice — I suspect that this would apply to anyone who comes after me—I would want to accept such advice. Until that time it would be prejudice on my part, one way or the other, if I decided on a whim that I did not think a case had been made out. There is no technical basis for saying that.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) is correct. The House is charged with the duty of making legislation but against that—I do not wish to trespass on later debates—we attach great store by the powers and the functions of the Animal Procedures Committee. The Minister and the Secretary of State have put together a body of people whom we all hope will be able to carry out well the functions which, under the Bill, will rest with them.

I am not proposing that we duck out of this but it is right to avoid — we are prone to do this in the House sometimes — rushing headlong into a very technical area. We sympathise with the point being made, but I believe it would be right to leave this matter to the advice of the Animal Procedures Committee. In due course, if the Minister feels that the case has been made, one of the advantages of the Bill is that changes can be made by order. Such changes are subject to debate and decision in the House. In this case I believe that is the right way to proceed.

Mr. Fry: In response to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), may I say that I am not attacking the advisory committee, or the excellent people who are its members. Perhaps, alas, there is insufficient definition in the Bill as to what the committee should be doing and what its powers are. I am in favour of giving people a fair degree of latitude but nevertheless the responsibility, the buck, stops here in the House and later it will stop with the Secretary of State.

I am perturbed by a matter raised by the Minister in a letter to the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) dated 18 April in which he said:

> "There is no doubt in my mind that some of the cephalopods are highly organised and behaviourally sophisticated creatures, but there has yet been no adequate demonstration of their capacity to experience pain or other forms of suffering, in the way that we understand these concepts in respect of vertebrates."

I am making a plea on behalf of creatures about which we are insufficiently aware. It does seem very tenuous to justify any kind of experiment on the grounds that we do not know the pain that that particular creature will suffer. That point should be stressed during this debate.

I sincerely hope that the advisory committee will look at this matter. I hope that one of the first things it will do will be to instigate proper research so that the answer to the question of how much pain the creature will suffer —a relevant question—is resolved as soon as possible.

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): Both the octopus and the squid have highly developed, complicated nervous systems. For that reason they are frequently studied, especially regarding problems of neurophysiology.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) was right to table the amendment. However, the Minister is equally right in saying that it is a technical problem which ought to be considered by the Animal Procedures Committee. The strength of the Bill lies in the committee, which will be independent scientifically to study these problems. The general view in the House is that we should avoid unnecessary experimentation.

Mr. Livsey: I agree that this is a highly technical matter. As a result of what has been said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PERSONAL LICENCES

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 39, leave out 'qualifications' and insert 'biological or other relevant qualifications and of the'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this we shall discuss Government amendments Nos. 4, 5 and 6.

Mr. Mellor: This is the first of a series of Government amendments which deal with commitments and undertakings that I gave in Committee.

The aim of the amendment is to put on the face of the Bill a clear suggestion that the most essentially relevant qualification for those who will hold personal licences is a scientific biological one. However, it makes it clear that other qualifications may be relevant and that we should be cautious of suggesting that there are two classes of people — those with biological qualifications and those with other qualifications — and that the latter group is in a lower position than the former.

There would be difficulties if we sought to establish two orders of qualification. A person may have a qualification in biochemistry. However, a degree in biochemistry can be obtained without any contact with animals. Therefore, does the possession of that biological qualification make that person better qualified than someone without that so-called biological qualification?

Those who discovered DNA did not have biological qualifications and nor did the Curies. We are concerned not with someone's specific qualifications but with their skills. The project licensing system does not consider qualifications which a number of people obtained 20 years ago. That is not greatly relevant in a judgment of their abilities. I am proud to be a BA honours graduate of Cambridge university. However, that is not the primary qualification on which I am judged as a Member of this House.

Personal licensees are allowed to carry out only tasks for which they are deemed suitable and competent. The project licensing system ensures that only work which is approved may be carried out. That is why I hope that the House will accept that the clarification that I undertook to give is contained in amendment No. 3.

The other amendments seek to go further than this debate, but perhaps I may be allowed a pre-emptive bite. They do not advance the difficult judgment that has to be made concerning the experience of the individual when it falls for him to be assessed.

To try to establish classes of qualification based on the assumption that a biological qualification is either always necessary or somehow better than any other is invalid. Each question has to be tested against the individual's merit. We provide the system in project licensing where that can best be done.

Mr. Fry: I think that we can dispose of this matter fairly quickly. As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, in Committee some of us were troubled because certain experiments were carried out by people without any knowledge of biology, despite the fact that such knowledge was necessary. We cited the example of physicists irradiating animals to death, and I know that my hon. Friend disapproves of that as much as I do.

Does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that, if some biological understanding is necessary, there should be supervision by a competent biologist? If he cannot put that on the face of the Bill, will he agree to include it in the Department's guidelines?

Mr. Mellor: Under the personal licensing system no one will be licensed to carry out something that he cannot do. One of the prime ways of discovering whether he can do it is to see what qualifications he has. Under the project licensing system a range of people might need to work on a complicated project. The important thing is to ensure that where the project goes wider than the individual's speciality there is someone who can take an overview, who is appropriately qualified by virtue of his experience or paper qualifications, and who is entrusted with that work. It is key to the project licensing system that that sort of judgment should be made. There would be no purpose in having the system if we were not confident that that could be done. If it was not done, the whole system would be pointless.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5

PROJECT LICENCES

Mr. Livsey: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 4, line 33 at end insert—

'(3A) A project licence shall not be granted unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that the possible use of non-animal techniques has been thoroughly considered and found not to be practicable.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 12, in page 4, line 34, at end insert—

'(3A) A project licence shall not be granted unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that the possible use of non-animal techniques has been thoroughly considered and found not to be practicable.'.

No. 13, in page 4, line 38, at end insert

'He shall consider also whether non-animal techniques can be used to reduce the number of animals used in the programme and what techniques can be used to reduce any animal suffering entailed in the programme.'.

Government amendment No. 15.

Mr. Livsey: The amendment seeks to ensure that non-animal techniques are thoroughly considered, and that they are included in the spirit of the Bill. The Minister has stated that under the project licence application system this will naturally be done. But he agreed with the spirit of the amendment in Committee, and said that he would table an amendment to that effect. He has done so in Government amendment No. 15.

The amendments are stated in the Home Office guidelines, but it is felt that the matter is of such importance that it should be written into the Bill. The Government have continually stressed that that is the aim of the Bill, so why not include it? Some foreign laws contain similar provisions. I refer, for example, to the German animal welfare Act. The amendment would give animal welfarists much more legal power to ensure that the number of animal experiments is reduced. It would place the burden on the researcher to prove that alternatives were not available, as opposed to relying on the Government inspectors.

The amendment stresses commitment through pressure, and would help to prevent unnecessary animal experimentation when it was economically better than pursuing a non-animal alternative. This is particularly true in the case of rats. Many scientists feel that non-animal techniques sometimes provide better results, such as in tissue cultures. Ciba Geigy estimates that out of 3,000 chemical compound tests, only 20 show enough therapeutic activity and low enough toxicity, on the basis of animal tests, to be tested on human volunteers. Of those 20, only one ever becomes a prescription drug. That is a 5 per cent. success rate.

That alone seems cause enough to pursue alternative methods. For example, we could consider computers to replace living animals. There seems to be tremendous scope for such work to be done. The problem with the Minister's amendment is that it places responsibility on the individual to ensure that he has given adequate consideration to the feasibility" of pursuing options not involving the use of "protected animals". First, what is adequate consideration? Secondly, and more importantly, how does one define "feasibility"? Does it mean that economically it is not feasible to pursue an alternative because a research project is not sufficiently funded?

8.45 pm

Sir Dudley Smith: I support the Government's amendment, which my hon. Friend the Minister promised us in Committee. It is very useful. The House and the public wish to move as quickly as possible towards experiments that do not involve the use of animals. I very much subscribe to that view. However, although I am not a scientist I am advised that the number of experiments that could be done without animals in some types of medical research is very limited. Work is going on to try to find a solution, and we hope that it will prove successful. One day—perhaps not in our time—there will be no need to use animals in experiments, but until that happy day we shall have to continue with such experiments in the interest of man's humanity to man.

In case anyone has any dubiety about the use of animals by pharmaceutical companies I shall repeat what I said in Committee. My evidence, and that of many others, points to the fact that those who handle the animals do so very carefully and feelingly. They do not particularly like having to use animals for experiments. At the most basic level, it is quite expensive to use animals in experiments, and if cheaper ways of experimenting could be found it would be very useful.

Unfortunately, some people do not want to understand what goes on, but others cannot understand what goes on. No one has his mind closed to the prospect of getting rid of animals in experimentation. However, in the interests of mankind, it would be dangerous not to have a fully-fledged system in operation that is at least as effective as the present system.

Sir Gerard Vaughan: It is a sad fact that those working on the AIDS virus, which looks like causing such a terrible disease, tried desperately hard not to use animals. They looked at all sorts of animals, but at present the only animals that the AIDS virus can be developed in is the monkey. Most of us do not want to see monkeys used, but there is no alternative.

Sir Dudley Smith: My hon. Friend speaks with all the authority of a medically qualified man. I had heard that rumour, and am glad to have his confirmation.

Opponents of the Bill may say that AIDS is a disease that man has inflicted on himself. However, that does not help the thousands of people who have it, are likely to get it, or who become infected with it in some unusual way, other than the ways that have been explained to us.

Mankind would fail in its duty if it did not try to find a cure for that dreaded disease and did not carry out experiments with the object of conquering it. I shall not weary the House with a long list of dread diseases in years gone by. Many of us would have died in childhood if there had not been animal experimentation. But the advances of modern medicine have eliminated many of those diseases. That could not have been achieved without animal experimentation. The House and the public would do well to bear in mind the very relevant comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan).

Mr. Corbett: One of the things that needs saying in this debate, perhaps not for the last time, is that it must be hoped that the Bill will set a climate which will cause those applying particularly for project licences to think twice or maybe three times about what they are proposing to do. Indeed, the only way in which the Bill can work, never mind the machinery which it puts in place, is if that is the starting point for the consideration, let alone the application, of those project licences.

Everyone who has taken part in the debates on the Bill has argued that its ambition must be to try to ensure that fewer animals are used in fewer experiments. That has been one of the major criticisms of people outside who have said that nowhere does the Bill say that that should be one of its major aims.

Clause 5 lays down the grounds on which experiments can be carried out, but nowhere in the Bill, except by inference, and in the guidance notes, does the Bill lay down that project licence applicants should be able to demonstrate that they have considered, and for reasons which they can demonstrate have said do not apply, non-animal alternatives to what they are proposing.

The Minister will acknowledge and understand that there was strong pressure on Second Reading and in Committee for that to be written on the face of the Bill where it could be seen by everyone rather than tucked away in the notes of guidance which are not so easily available. Against that background, I am glad that the Government have responded to that pressure with amendment No. 15, and I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will welcome and support it.

Mr. Fry: I thank my hon. Friend for amendment No. 15 which, as he appreciates, is in response to the amendment that I moved in Committee which was supported on both sides. I shall say no more on amendment No. 12, but I should like my hon. Friend to say a few words on amendment No. 13. He will note that that goes a little further than merely talking about alternatives. It goes into the question of whether techniques can be used to reduce the number of animals used in a programme and also what techniques can be used to reduce any animal suffering.

In Committee we had a short debate on what is known as refining projects and one reason for my tabling this amendment was to draw attention again to the need for those who are going to apply for licences to be aware that there are possibilities of refining experiments, about which they are not always aware. It is the obligation of the inspectorate, in particular, to draw to the attention of those who are applying for licences where such refined experiments can take place. I hope that my hon. Friend will note that point.

Mr. Hancock: My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) questioned the words "feasibility" and "adequate consideration" in the Government amendment. Will the Minister dwell on those points and explore the possibilities? Does that mean that it may not be feasible in the time available to obtain the necessary components to create a non-animal alternative to the testing of an animal so that an animal is then used for the sake of convenience? May it not be feasible to obtain a computer result, which may be more accurate, because the researcher does not have access to such a computer? Could it be that adequate consideration may have been given to looking for one but that it could not be obtained because commercial expertise was jealously guarded by another manufacturer who carried out experiments of that nature? Has the Minister explored the possibilities of when his discretion will be used, bearing in mind the words "adequate consideration", the alternatives, the cost involved and so on? Those are important points.

I appreciate that the Minister has gone some way to meeting the points raised in Committee and again this evening, but those two questions need to be answered.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to most of those who have spoken for recognising that the Government's amendment is worth while. Certainly its aim is to put on the face of the Bill one of the crucial elements—but only one—in the judgment that has to be made about a project licence, and that is whether there is an alternative.

In defence of the amendment I should say that it is slightly more radical than others because it specifies not non-animal alternatives, but alternatives that do not involve the use of protected animals. That means that, if using man is a viable alternative, a protected animal may not be used.

Interestingly, the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) neatly exposes the Morton's fork which one always faces in such arrangements. The great argument against putting a matter such as this on the face of the Bill is that, far from adding clarity, it reduces it because statutory words have to be weighed in a manner in which clear explanations in guidelines would not have to be weighed. That is one reason why I am all for rejecting putting things such as the pain condition in the statute. They are much better in guidelines, where the practical effect is the same.

Self-praise is no recommendation, but there are few who have shown their devotion to alternatives more than I, so of course I am pleased to embrace the amendment. But the hon. Gentleman, having been one of those who asked for it, now asks what feasibility means. All I can say is that the aim of the parliamentary draftsman has been to put into the Bill—I believe that he has succeeded—what we have always said we were setting out to do, and that is that no project licence should be granted if there is an alternative method that would involve the use of a non-sensate alternative or, in appropriate cases, animals that are not protected under the Bill, which might be man or invertebrates. I hope that that is what feasibility means. The Parliamentary draftsman assures me that it does and I hope that he is right. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South will, I hope, not mind me saying that he is more likely to be right than the hon. Gentleman on the evidence that we have had so far.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear in mind the words of caution about putting too many things on the face of the statute when we come to consider proposals to do more of that later. It is worth while asserting on the face of the Bill our commitment to alternatives, and that is what we are doing.

The Government's amendment is framed so as to place the burden on the applicant to satisfy the Secretary of State. It is not for the Secretary of State to satisfy the applicant about anything. It is for the applicant to satisfy the Secretary of State that he should be granted a project licence. If the Secretary of State is not satisfied that, on the evidence presented by the applicant, he has made out a good case for the use of protected animals, that consent will be withheld.

The reduction in the number of animals used and the reduction of suffering is at the heart of the Bill. The project licence will be geared to make judgments, first, about the type of animals that might be used. Obviously, if a rat can be used, no one will be given permission to use a primate, very much along the the lines described by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), a propos the work that he says is going on in AIDS. Secondly, permission will only be given to use the minimum number necessary and tremendous scope has been found to reduce the number of animals already in, for example, some toxicity tests where unnecessarily large batches were used; we shall not permit that.

Currently, there is an upper limit on suffering—the pain clause—and everything is all right provided that it does not violate that pain clause. A major step forward in the Bill is the provision that, as part of the balance that must be struck between the purposes of the procedure and the severity of the procedure on the animal, only a limited number of procedures will be allowed to approach the old pain condition and the others will be scaled down to lower categories. That is just part of the Government's approach to this matter.

I hope that hon. Members will not want to proceed with amendment No. 7, but will accept Government amendment No. 15. When an amendment is available that has been drafted by parliamentary counsel, it might be for the benefit of the House to accept it rather than the other amendment. I am grateful for the indication that that appears to be acceptable to the House.

Mr. Livsey: Amendment No. 15 is a great improvement on the previous position and I accept the spirit in which it has been explained by the Minister. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

[Mr. Livsey]

Amendment made: No. 15, in page 4, line 38, at end insert—

'(4A) The Secretary of State shall not grant a project licence unless he is satisfied that the applicant has given adequate consideration to the feasibility of achieving the purpose of the programme to be specified in the licence by means not involving the use of protected animals.'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

CONSULTATION

Mr. Fry: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 7, line 31, leave out from 'one' to end of line 34 and insert 'or more of the insepctors appointed under this Act, who shall consult an independent assessor or assessors. The inspectors may, in addition, consult the Animal Procedures Committee established by this Act.'.

This amendment has been tabled on behalf of the RSPCA and raises a very important issue. I do not think that anyone doubts the intentions of my hon. Friend the Minister or the efficiency of the Home Office inspectorate. However, there is concern in certain quarters, especially in view of the existing number of licences, that the inspectors will have a very heavy work load.

In Committee, my hon. Friend said that several thousand licences already existed, and presumably they will have to be checked before they are renewed. One point that concerns both me and the RSPCA is whether there are sufficient inspectors, whether they can cover especially severe experiments and whether, even with all their wisdom and experience, they are always sufficiently experienced to deal with every kind of application.

I ask that because research becomes ever more sophisticated. Some of us believe that the inspectorate needs a backstop—not that under the Bill they should be allowed to consult other inspectors, but that they should actually be encouraged to do so because the other inspectors, in turn, could consult an independent assessor or assessors.

I strongly believe that, if the Bill is to be successful, it will require a great deal from the Home Office inspectors. They will have a real responsibility to ensure that the Bill achieves its main objective, which is to reduce animal pain and suffering. Therefore, they will require the maximum assistance.

I accept that to ask the advisory committee to look at all the applications probably means that it will be bogged down in paper work. As we have already said, there are many matters for that body, and new thinking is a particular direction in which we hope it will move. I accept the Government's argument, both in another place and in Committee, that the advisory committee is not the body to be responsible in this instance. However, I believe that it could and should be consulted, and it is important that it is in a position to be consulted.

In putting forward the amendment, the RSPCA suggested that the inspectorate, at an early opportunity after enactment of the Bill, should set up an expert panel spanning a broad range of disciplines, and including a statistician. It should be set up in consultation with the Animal Procedures Committee and be available for consultation on the possible refinement of project licence applications. Members of the panel should be consulted in a large proportion of cases, and on most of the cases involving substantial severity.

I hope that when my hon. Friend replies to the debate he will clearly spell out the way in which he envisages the inspectorate being able to cope. I hope, too, that he will inform the House how he views the task of the inspectorate, especially in reviewing the very large number of existing licences and on the question of how future licences will be reviewed so that—I say this with all sincerity—because of the amount of work that the inspectorate will have and, perhaps, because of a lack of knowledge, there will be no suspicion of any rubber-stamping of future licence applications.

Mr. Corbett: I know that the Minister will have spotted one important point relating to the amendment. It is true, as the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) said, that, increasingly, research is becoming more and more sophisticated and refined, and I welcome that. It is rather like looking at the situation as though it were a funnel. It is to be hoped that we are at the narrow end rather than the wide end. In other words, we expect research, where possible, to be more specifically targeted and precise.

I mean to cast no reflection at all on the confidence or integrity of individual inspectors or the inspectorate as a whole. I know that an ambition of the enlarged inspectorate is to develop individual skills, but I point out that they will be busy men and, I hope, women. Having regard to what I have said about the refinement of research in the area—and I hope that the Minister can reassure us on this point—it may be expecting too much, in the case of some of the narrowly targeted project applications to which I have referred, that on every occasion inspectors will have the required knowledge.

Common sense clearly dictates that, when an individual inspector does not have the knowledge, he should be entirely free to consult his colleagues. Occasionally, it could happen that among his colleagues a certain piece of specialised knowledge and experience is missing. Again, logically, I expect that there will be no let or hindrance in those circumstances to prevent an inspector—and the number of cases of this type are likely to be fewer than the fingers on one hand — from contacting recognised experts in the field and taking such advice as is offered. If that happens, it will be in the spirit of this amendment.

Mr. Mellor: As always, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) has been most helpful, and what he says is right. I point out to the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) that the measure contains a transitional arrangement so that over the years everyone with an existing licence will be brought within the framework of the legislation, and the project licensing system will become a twin pillar with the personal licensing system, which is the only one of the two systems that presently exists. We recognise that a greater strain will be imposed on the inspectorate, and that is why, as I have said, we are in the process of recruiting three more officers to increase the number from 15 to 18, with another three in the pipeline and possibly more, if required.

Each officer has to be a doctor or veterinarian. It is hoped that, as well as being able, by virtue of their expertise, to deal with their own duties in a region, within the inspectorate, there will be individual expertise, so that inspectors might consult each other. It is important to create an atmosphere in which no one suggests that other links are in this chain because we are not confident about one link, but that it is understood that they are all there to try to ensure that the sophisticated judgment that has to be made on each application can be made and that, however complicated the project might be, a proper and expert, not prejudiced, judgment can be made.

That is why it has always been part of the conception of the Bill, as I have argued throughout, that, where there is any doubt or difficulty, we should be capable of referring matters to assessors who are themselves experts in particular fields. We also desire that the Animal Procedures Committee should have among its membership expert and qualified people who are able to join with their colleagues in ensuring that responsibilities are discharged properly and to do what the advisory committee already does, which is to consider for the Secretary of State especially difficult applications. We do not want the committee to be overburdened with difficult work. But at present it is there to do what the Secretary of State asks it to do. If the House accepts a later amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the new Animal Procedures Committee will determine what it should do. That will be a further safeguard.

Most applications will be able to be dealt with by the inspectorate. The inspector will act alone, consult the deputy and chief inspectors, or consult the expert within the inspectorate. The inspector should feel that it is a sign of strength of the arrangements that when he needs an assessor he is able to refer to one, and not an admission of failure on his part. If the Animal Procedures Committee or anyone else were to feel that judgments were being made too often without assessors, it would be open to the APC or to others to come to that conclusion.

I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingbrough not to pursue the argument that the inspector must consult an assessor on every application. We are anxious that resources should not be tied up in ensuring that the unnecessary is done. Many applications will be straightforward and an experienced inspector will be able to decide them himself. I suspect that only a minority will be of such complexity that the inspectors will need to go outside their own ranks. The spirit that we wish to engender is that inspectors will consult whenever they feel doubt, and that is the way that we approach the task.

It may be of interest to the House to know that the scientific adviser to the RSPCA, who is a member of the advisory committee and who will be appointed to the APC, came to see me the other day. I said that part of the start of the relationship between the new APC and the inspectorate will be the establishment of an early meeting so that each body can get together to talk about these issues and how they should work together. These matters can best be dealt with in the spirit of co-operation rather than compulsion.

This has been a useful and helpful debate and I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough is sufficiently reassured not to pursue the amendment.

Mr. Fry rose——

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let us finish this debate.

Mr. Fry: I have listened most carefully to my hon. Friend the Minister and I accept the assurances that he has given. The proof of what he has said, however, will not be known until the Bill becomes an Act and has been in operation for some time. I am sure that Members of this place and of organisations such as the RSPCA will be watching carefully to ensure that what he has had to say comes into effect. I accept my hon. Friend's good intentions and, therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask the House to forgive me for inserting a point of order on a different subject, but it is one that calls for a statement this evening, on information that has come from the Fairford base in Gloucestershire. On 14 April, at column 579, I raised with the House the need last month for a statement to be made on what was happening in relation to Libya. At 11.15 pm that night I was telephoned by the same sources, which I am prepared to give to the authorities of the House, and told that they were greatly concerned that air tankers had taken off in most unusual circumstances from Fairford. That was last Monday, before the strike against Libya.

The same sources have just telephoned to say that they believe that the United States Government this evening have announced that together with European allies, and possibly Canadians, a major exercise is being announced called Operation Elderforest. This involves 100 F111s and in-flight refuelling facilities taking part in an exercise in conjunction with American naval forces off the coast of Libya. This will involve the American carrier force. As last Monday's sources turned out to be too tragically accurate, this Monday may I ask, through the usual channels, whether it will be possible to have a Government statement on these sinister developments?

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I heard this evening on the six o'clock news that the United States Government had rightly announced that tomorrow a number of their fighter aircraft would be used in a major NATO exercise from this country. So that people would not be alarmed, following recent events, the United States Government had seen fit to announce that this exercise would take place. They did not want people near the bases to be disturbed by the take-off of the aircraft.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the hon. Members for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and for Crawley (Mr. Soames) realise that this is not a matter for the Chair. The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to the usual channels. They are represented in the Chamber, and no doubt will have heard the hon. Member's comments.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Of course, we shall pursue the matter through the usual channels. Regardless of any announcement, I believe that the news from Fairford means that hon. Members should be able to have an input into these events rather than hold an inquest afterwards.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand what the hon. Member says, but this is not a matter for the Chair. My job is to ensure that we proceed with the business of the day, and we must now do so.

Clause 10

CONDITIONS

9.15 pm

Mr. Fry: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 8, line 16, at end insert—

'(b) the Secretary of State shall consider granting exceptions to this condition only in very limited circumstances. In all such cases he shall notify the Animal Procedures Committee.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 20.

Mr. Fry: I am prepared to accept Government amendment No. 20 because my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has done his best to honour the obligations he gave in Committee. This is an important matter. There is widespread concern, especially about the possible fate of cats and dogs that might be used in research establishments. Today, the Committee for Information on Animal Research rightly pointed out that the Bill insisted that dogs and cats must be bred at and obtained from a designated breeding establishment. It stated that there was no provision which made it an offence to supply rather than use animals which had not been purpose-bred. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will answer that point in speaking to Government amendment No. 20.

Mr. Mellor: I shall deal with the last point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) in a later debate, because it does not arise in relation to Government amendment No. 20. I shall think about his point.

Government amendment No. 20 is in response to the concern in Committee that appropriately rigorous conditions should be attached to the use of man's companion animals. I believe that this makes clear the limited extent to which exceptions are permitted in the use of animals from breeding establishments. I hope especially that it gives further weight to the clear prohibition on the face of the Bill and in arrangements made under it against the use of pets in laboratories.

Mr. Fry: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment made: No. 20, in page 8, line 21, at end insert

'but no exception shall be made from the condition required by paragraph (a) above unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that no animal suitable for the purpose of the programme specified in the licence can be obtained in accordance with that condition.'
—[Mr. Mellor.]

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 8, line 40, at end insert—

'(5A) The conditions of a certificate issued under section 6 or 7 above shall include conditions requiring the holder of the certificate—

(a) to secure that a person competent to kill animals in the manner specified by conditions imposed in accordance with subsection (5) above will be available to do so; and

(b) to keep records as respects the source and disposal of and otherwise relating to the animals kept at the establishment for experimental or other scientific purposes or, as the case may be, bred or kept for breeding there or kept there for the purposes of being supplied for use in regulated procedures.'.

This is a significant new amendment which relates to important issues which were debated in Committee. As the House will see, there are two limbs to the new subsection (5A) to clause 10. The first deals with euthanasia and the second with rigorous record keeping.

On the first matter, subsection (5) of clause 10 already requires establishments to use only approved methods when killing surplus animals or animals which have been bred at or bought for breeding or supplying establishments but not supplied for use in laboratories. The new requirement obliges the establishment to ensure that there is available a person competent to kill animals in the requisite manner — either using a method appropriate under schedule 1 or another method approved by the Secretary of State for use at the establishment concerned. Therefore, there is a tightening up.

Finally, on the second matter—this relates to some of the discussions we had on new clause 2—it is plainly crucial that the representatives of the Secretary of State should have access to the clearest records that indicate where animals came from and where they have gone to. This amendment spells that out even more forcefully in the Bill. On that basis, I commend amendment No. 21 to the House.

Sir Dudley Smith: I shall take only a few moments. I should like to support my hon. Friend on this amendment. Perhaps, at the same time, I can tell my hon. Friend the Minister that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), who is attending the Council of Europe in Strasbourg—where I should also be — knew that I would be here and I promised that I would endeavour to raise an issue for him.

My hon. Friend tells me that the amendment just moved by the Minister, and the provisions of the Bill generally under this section, impose an extra financial burden on the teaching of mammalian physiology, which is essential in the training of doctors and veterinary surgeons, at St. Catherine's college in Cambridge, which is in his constituency. He tells me that that department may be forced to close as a result. Would my hon. Friend the Minister please bear this problem in mind, especially in any future negotiations with the Treasury, because it is important? It is a good example of a department which is doing its work excellently and carefully and which will fully respond to the provisions of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

RIGHT TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 9, line 31 after 'scientific', insert 'or other appropriate'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 23, in page 9, line 33 after 'scientific', insert 'or animal welfare'.

Mr. Mellor: After some discussion in Committee, it was suggested that we should mention that there would be other appropriate qualifications. It was specified in the original amendment in Committee that animal welfare qualifications were the appropriate ones. The difficulty is one of definition, of knowing what animal welfare qualifications mean as a concept in the Bill. For that reason, having taken advice from draftsmen, "or other appropriate" is suggested. That would embrace animal welfare expertise as being of increasing significance, in my judgment, in meeting the demands placed upon research establishments by the new statutory arrangements.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I am grateful for what the Minister has said. Clearly, there was a difficulty that those with wholly proper animal welfare qualifications appeared, as the Bill was originally drafted, to be excluded. If the Minister can assure the House, as I believe his comments did, that the words "or other appropriate" mean people without university standard qualifications but with good experience and proper qualifications to do the job, I would not wish to proceed with our amendment and I would support the Government.

Amendment agreed to.

SUSPENSION IN CASES OF URGENCY

Mr. Mark Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 10, line 6, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

We discussed in Committee the curious position that, where the Secretary of State was satisfied of the urgent necessity that the welfare of a protected animal required a cessation order to be placed, he might, or could, or shall, or may, act. There was a lengthy discussion about semantics. I have just received over the grapevine some information which is not available to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall therefore simply move the amendment.

Mr. Mellor: We had some fun in Committee because "may" sometimes means "may" but sometimes means "shall". "Shall" normally means "shall". On this occasion I am advised by the draftsman that "may" means "shall", but if "may" means "shall", it seems better to use the word "shall". I therefore accept the hon. Gentleman's amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

RE-USE OF PROTECTED ANIMALS

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 10, line 28, leave out 'any' and insert 'a particular'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 28 and 29.

Mr. Mellor: This is another semantic amendment, but it is a useful one. It is intended to deal with the difficulties caused in our discussions by the concept of "a series of regulated procedures for any purpose".

Some people, including myself, have found the phrase difficult to interpret. I have been anxious for some clarification.

Our difficulty in drafting the Bill has been that, in moving from the concept of an experiment to the concept of a regulated procedure, we have had to try to define a project of work that would normally have been termed an experiment. The phrase is aimed at that. Perhaps, however, it gives the impression of a series without end. That would be quite wrong. It is not what we intend. To remedy that, we propose to insert the words "a particular" in place of the word "any" in clauses 14 and 15, so that the phrase will read tying it down to the one purpose for which a project licence is granted. I commend those minor but helpful amendments to the House.

"a series of regulated procedures for any purpose"

"a series of regulated procedures for a particular purpose",

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Corbett: I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 10, line 30, at end insert

'and (c) has been subjected to procedures involving substantial severity'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 27, in page 10, line 38, leave out from 'animal' to end of line 41.

Mr. Corbett: The House will recall that, when we debated this matter in Committee, there was a narrow vote —9 to 7—in favour of amending the Bill to permit re-use. I am sure that the House is grateful for a chance to give a view on this important matter. It was the most substantial alteration made to the Bill in Committee, and one that I personally regret. I accept the argument on re-use where the animal is under general anaesthetic throughout the further procedures, and not allowed to recover consciousness.

I wish that I had thought more clearly about this matter earlier. In my view, the whole clause is built on the wrong premise. It is not, in my view, the anaesthetic that is the vital point, but the severity of the initial procedure. Amendment No. 26 seeks to exclude animals experimented on at a considerable degree of severity. I believe that where that has happened it would be wrong to make an animal go through it all again.

Every animal's suffering is its own. Those of us who reluctantly accept the present need for experiment believe that one substantially severe procedure under anaesthetic is enough. That animal should then be allowed to recover —as some do—or to die with as much dignity as has been left to it.

One of the main arguments about re-use is that re-use under the terms of the Bill and under the qualifications in the guidance notes can save the lives of some animals. In other words, permitting re-use can stop even a single substantially severe procedure on animals that might otherwise be used. The supporters of that argument claim that about 5,000 animals a year — dogs, cats, and primates — might be saved; only "might be saved", because no one can be sure. With the rising cost of laboratory animals, some might argue that re-use may come down to a question of money.

9.30 pm

I can see the benefits of re-use especially for university research departments and, to a lesser extent, for some of the major commerical interests. I must say, however, that I do not believe that consideration of the costs of experiments in terms of the costs of the animals put through these procedures should be a consideration. It is not the proper responsibility of the House to put those concerns above the proper interests of the welfare of animals used in laboratories.

This is a matter above all else of morality and ethics.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Humbug.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. and learned Member says, "Humbug." I am only sorry, if my memory serves me correctly, that the hon. Gentleman was not present for the

[Mr. Corbett]

Second Reading debate or during the Committee stages. Now that he is present, I hope that he will pay the House the courtesy of listening.

This is a matter of morality and ethics. I therefore conclude that the Standing Committee was wrong and the House should reverse the decision taken in Committee and come down in favour of the animals. Most of us find experiments abhorrent but acknowledge the need for them in the search for cures and treatment for diseases such as muscular dystrophy, senile dementia, AIDS or the ten or more most common forms of cancer. I believe that one contribution at a level of substantial severity by an animal is sufficient. I will therefore vote for the amendment in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Gale: We covered this ground carefully during the Committee stages of the Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) knows that I respect his concern for the welfare of animals. He in turn, I believe, respects my concern. This is the one issue above all others upon which the Committee was divided across party lines. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, he took no side whatsoever in the Division on this matter in Committee, and that was a rare thing for him to do. The hon. Member for Erdington will recall that it was his hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) who originally moved the amendment.

In the Standing Committee I quoted from my speech on Second Reading:

"Mobilisation said, in its literature following the publication of the supplementary White Paper: 'After strong representation from animal rights groups the Government now proposes to forbid the re-use of animals . . . however, the issue of re-use may well re-surface because of strong pro-vivisection interests'." —[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 18 March 1986; c. 194.]

As it did in Committee, so again. The issue has not resurfaced because of strong pro-vivisection interests; it has resurfaced in the interests of animal welfare. The hon. Member for Erdington and I are faced with the dilemma of deciding whether in our opinion—and this is in no way a party political issue — the permission by the Secretary of State under specified circumstances for the re-use of some animals will obviate the use of others. It is the considered opinion of the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments — the all-party group which I have the privilege to chair—that that will be the case.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned 5,000 animals. I do not think that any of us would claim that as many as that are likely to be saved if the clause remains as drafted. I suggest, however, that if, by the re-use of fully anaesthetised animals, the life of one animal can be saved, we shall have achieved yet again what we seek to achieve throughout the Bill—first the diminution and then the total elimination of animal experimentation. If the matter is to be pressed to a Division, I strongly urge the House to accept the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for East Kilbride in Committee and to leave the clause as it now stands.

Mr. Fry: We discussed this in great detail in Committee. I made this point then and I make it again today. If clause 14 were taken in isolation, I would entirely agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) and join him in the Lobby, but we must look at the Bill in its entirety. I ask the hon. Gentleman to consider clause 15, which provides:

"Where a protected animal—

(a) has been subjected to a series of regulated procedures for any purpose; and

(b) at the conclusion of the series is suffering or likely to suffer adverse effects, the person who applied those procedures, or the last of them, shall cause the animal to be immediately killed".

Either that means that any animal suffering severely is to be put down at the end of the procedures or it does not. As I understand it, it means that the animal will be killed. Therefore, although I agree with the sentiments of the hon. Gentleman, I believe that his amendment is unnecessary because his worries are taken care of by clause 15. I do not accuse the hon. Gentleman of wasting the time of the House because this is an important issue, but I put that point to him in the hope that he will feel a little happier about the views of those of us who do not agree with him on the amendment.

Sir Dudley Smith: As was recognised in Committee, this is understandably an emotional subject, especially for people outside, and there is abhorrence at the idea of animals being brought back and subjected to what would almost certainly be a kind of torture, but we must look at the matter with a certain amount of scientific clarity to determine whether we have got it right.

The European convention, which we have signed, allows further experiments to take place on the same animal provided that it is subject to general anaesthesia throughout, from which it is not allowed to recover. Any animal anaesthetised for a procedure which is terminal, which means that it is to die, will not experience any suffering or distress.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), I feel that it is more humane to reduce the number of animals used through this limited provision for re-use than to continue using more and more animals—provided that there is the very strong stipulation that the animal is fully anaesthetised and experiences no suffering whatever. I appreciate that this is repulsive to many people and it is unpalatable to those of us who are concerned with these matters, but it seems to me to be a contribution of sorts to reducing the number of animals used in experiments — with the guarantee that the animal concerned will not suffer as a result of future and unrelated procedures.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have considerable sympathy with the amendment and with the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). Like my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), I hope that the elimination of the use of animals for experimental purposes is gradually approaching. It is certainly a goal for which all humane people should aim. I wonder whether it is legitmate to argue that, by permitting the re-use of animals, we are preventing the use of more animals, as has been suggested. I wonder how many animals would be saved from first use if re-use were permitted.

Sir Dudley Smith: The number is small and nobody would suggest otherwise, but it is a contribution in the right direction.

Mr. Greenway: There is something to be said for my hon. Friend's argument. It is a fine ethical and humane point that, if an animal has been subjected to major experimentation once, it should be allowed to go free. I rather go along with that view. I wonder how reasonable it is to use an animal, bring it back to full vigour and then use it again. That seems somewhat deplorable.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend suggests that an animal, once used, should be allowed to go free. I am sorry that he was not present when we discussed this matter extremely carefully in Committee. There is no question of the animals being allowed to go free. Beagles, for example, might be allowed to be found domestic homes, but there are far too many cats and dogs being put down each day in the Battersea home for there to be any reasonable prospect of these animals being set free.

Mr. Greenway: There might be times when animals can be released into their natural habitat or into domestic use, but I was speaking figuratively. Repeated use of an animal for experiments will diminish its resilience, however well it is brought back to health. I am not happy about that. I have considerable sympathy with the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Erdington.

Mr. Livsey: It should be enough for an animal to be subjected to substantial severity once. It is undesirable that it should be used again. Amendment No. 26 is extremely humane. Animals that have been subjected to substantial pain should not be allowed to endure more suffering.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to those who have spoken. I shall try to emulate their brevity as this matter was considered fully in one of the most absorbing Committee debates in which I have been privileged to take part.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) understands that there is a technical flaw in amendment No 26, which means that he will not pursue it. We are really discussing amendment No. 27, which is the proposal to return the Bill to the state in which it came from the Lords by taking out the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Miller).

This is not a party issue. Indeed, a most interesting pattern of voting was established in Committee. I abstained for the perfectly honourable reason that I could see both sides of the argument, having held both views during the previous few months. I originally took the view, and the White Paper proposed, that there were significant savings to be made, especially among animals about which we are most troubled—man's companions, cats, dogs and primates—if, under careful arrangements and with proper safeguards, we permitted re-use. It seemed arbitrary that re-use was not permitted. It seemed that the only consequence of the ban on re-use when an animal had been under a general anaesthetic was that more cats, dogs and monkeys would have to be used. None of us want that and that is why the White Paper recommended a change in the law.

A barrage of complaints were received about that view. The Government's views were travestied by one or two campaigning organisations which suggested that we were anxious to remove protections, whereas our only wish was to minimise the number of animals being used humanely in experiments. It therefore seemed to me to be wrong that this proposal—significant though it was—should put into jeopardy the credibility of a Bill of such significance as the one that we are now discussing. For that reason, this proposal was not pursued in the second White Paper or in the Bill as published, and, despite considerable reservations expressed by a number of members of the other place, that was the basis on which the Bill arrived in this House.

We had a debate in Committee and strong feelings were expressed based on a most cogent set of arguments advanced by FRAME. It posed the dilemma that the Bill unamended would make it possible for two healthy dogs to be given terminal anaesthesia in the same laboratory on the same day, the first because it had been previously used in a procedure that had required anaesthesia, and the second only for the reason that it would be illegal to carry out an experiment on the first dog in the interval between loss of consciousness and death. As a result, two dogs would die when only one need have done so. That argument carried the day in Committee, and that is the argument that is now being put to the House.

I thought it appropriate to play no part in the vote in Committee for the reasons that I have explained. But I believe that the Committee took a clear decision after careful debate. I see the force of the reasons why the Committee took that decision, and I commend that decision to the House, although I shall understand if other hon. Members feel the other way.

The key to the determination of the House might lie in the last matter that I wish to raise. Much will turn on the basis on which the rules are laid down as to when re-use is needed. Everyone on whichever side of the argument agrees that re-use must be permitted only under very stringent conditions. Even if the stringency of those conditions means that re-use is prohibited in some cases, that must be right because the concept of pin cushion mice or rats that have bits chopped off them day after day is unappealing. Although that lies in the realm of satire, we must be absolutely certain that it does not take place.

I bound myself in Committee to be sure that the Secretary of State would prepare rigorous guidelines for re-use. Those guidelines are now being finally determined. When they are, they will be put to the Animal Procedures Committee for its advice and they will then be put to the House and be subject to the negative resolution procedure.

It might assist the House if I read out the guidelines as presently drafted so that those who are concerned about this matter might see just how carefully and cautiously the Secretary of State proposes to exercise the discretion that the Committee has given him. The draft guidelines state:

"The Home Secretary's consent is required before anybody can use again for a different purpose an animal which has previously been used in a series of procedures for some other purpose and during that series has been given a general anaesthetic from which it has been allowed to recover consciousness. The animal must not, at the end of the first series of procedures, be suffering or likely to suffer adverse effects. If re-use is permitted, the animal must be under general anaesthesia throughout the further procedures and not allowed to recover consciousness. All the subsequent procedures must be performed under general anaesthesia. Preparatory procedures, under local anaesthesia or without anaesthetic, are not allowed. A project licence applicant or project licence holder who wishes to apply for consent to the re-use of an animal in these circumstances should apply to the inspector. The inspector will consider all the factors that appear to him relevant before deciding whether or not to recommend to the Home Secretary that the application should be allowed.

Any re-use will be permitted only if the animal has not suffered severe or lasting harm and is in a good state of general health, as certified by a veterinary surgeon.

[Mr. Mellor]

Avoidance of the use of further animals will be the sole criterion for permitting such re-use, and economic grounds or the convenience of licensees will not be allowable reasons.

The Home Secretary will not allow any animal to be kept for an excessive time (normally more than 48 hours) between first and terminal use.

Although permission may sometimes exceptionally be given for an animal to be moved from one scientific procedure establishment to another for re-use under terminal anaesthesia, under no circumstances would any such animal ever be allowed to be returned to a supplying establishment for re-distribution or re-sale."

I hope that it has been helpful for the House to hear how seriously the Home Secretary takes the balanced judgment arrived at in Committee. On that basis, I hope that the House will feel able to keep faith with the decision of the Committee. On whatever side of the question hon. Members decide, I hope that they will understand that, although this is a narrow but significant point, the highest standards of welfare will be applied in operating this section of the Bill just as they will be applied in operating all other sections.

Mr. Corbett: I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he dealt with this matter, although he will acknowledge that I am disappointed about his conclusions, especially in view of the narrow vote in Committee. It is unfortunate that we have neither more time nor more hon. Members wishing to debate what is for all hon. Members present and for many people outside the House a substantial issue. I understand and accept what the Minister read from the notes of guidance. To some extent, those notes meet some of our anxieties.

No hon. Member who has spoken in this short debate has claimed that the saving of animal life will be anything but small. That is the best guess that any hon. Member can make on either side of the argument. That is why I said, when I moved the amendment, that for me, and perhaps for other hon. Members, this essentially comes down to a moral and ethical judgment. It is not a matter of the anaesthetic and the fact that the animal does not recover from it. When an animal has been deeply anaesthetised and has gone through an experiment at a substantial level, what else do we have a right to expect that animal to do? In a nutshell, that is the reason why I ask my hon. and right hon. Friends to go into the Lobbies and vote for amendment No. 27.

Amendment proposed, No. 27 in page 10, line 38, leave out from 'animal' to end of line 41.—[Mr. Corbett.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill [Lords], the Statute Law Repeals Bill [Lords] and the Ways and Means Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

10.6 pm

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may know that about an hour ago I raised on a point of order the need for a Government statement on an exercise involving tanker aircraft and F-111s. After the most constructive discussions that I have had with the Opposition Chief Whip and the shadow defence spokesman, am I to assume that the Government are not volunteering any statement tonight? Is that the position?

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of a Government statement or of the incident that the hon. Gentleman has referred to.

Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

RE-USE OF PROTECTED ANIMALS

Amendment made: No. 28, in page 11, line 3, leave out 'any' and insert 'a particular'.—[Mr. Mellor]

Clause 15

KILLING ANIMALS AT CONCLUSION OF REGULATED PROCEDURES

Amendments made: No. 29, in page 11, line 13, leave out 'any' and insert 'a particular'.

No. 30, in page 11, line 19 leave out 'his personal licence' and insert

'the personal licence of the person by whom the animal is killed'.
—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 20

FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMITTEE

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 31 in page 13, line 32, leave out from 'as' to end of line 33 and insert 'the Committee may determine or as may be referred to the Committee by the Secretary of State'.

This is a significant amendment. It has always been our wish that the Animal Procedures Committee should be an independent body consisting of eminent people who are capable of offering advice to the Secretary of State, of their own volition taking action on aspects of the workings of the measure so as to be satisfied that it is working smoothly, and making reports on its deliberations to the House and to the wider public. It is crucial to that concept that the Animal Procedures Committee should not merely be invoked when the Secretary of State so wishes but should be able to initiate consideration of any matter that the Committee, acting together, believes is appropriate for it to look at. That is why the amendment states what it does, in particular using the word "determine" in the context of the committee's deliberations.

Mr. Corbett: I welcome what the Minister has just said, and the amendment, because it properly responds to the strong points made by many hon. Members in Committee and myself on the need to demonstrate and to specify that the Animal Procedures Committee is not the creature of the Secretary of State or the Home Office. The role and work of the Animal Procedures Committee, as we discussed earlier, is at the heart of the Bill. It is the Rolls-Royce version of the Farm Animal Welfare Council, because the Animal Procedures Committee has statutory parenthood and so a more independent life.

[Mr. Corbett]

We have sought to establish that the Animal Procedures Committee could speak without waiting to be spoken to. In other words, it could off its own bat decide to offer advice to the Secretary of State without waiting for him to ask for it. That is an important point.

The amendment should now lay at rest the charge from some here and many outside that the Animal Procedures Committee is a toothless wonder; a body of yes men and women on the end of a fairly short leash. The amendment makes it clear that that is not so. The Animal Procedures Committee has an independent life and can be expected to make such use of that independence in terms of comment and advice as it sees fit.

Critics outside have said that the range of relations among experimenters is too cosy. The Animal Procedures Committee can, in that context, act as an irritant and speak out independently on matters of concern to it without waiting to be asked. I hope that the House will welcome the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: We come now to amendment No. 32, with which it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 33 and 34.

Mr. Hancock: In view of the point made at the end of the Committee stage on this amendment and the other two amendments tabled with it, there is no purpose in delaying the House. Therefore, I shall not move amendment No. 32.

Mr. Fry: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will note that amendments Nos. 32, 33 and 34 come from different parts of the House. By not moving amendment No. 32, the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) has left no opportunity for the House to discuss amendment No. 34 in my name or amendment No. 33.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to speak on his amendment?

Mr. Fry: Indeed.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, it would be for the convenience of the House if I allowed the hon. Gentleman to move amendment No. 34.

Mr. Fry: I beg to move amendment No. 34, in page 13, line 33, at end insert—

'(1A) It shall be the duty of the Animal Procedures Committee to review, retrospectively, all licences granted in the category of substantial severity, and from time to time, to advise the Secretary of State on matters relating to the reduction of animal suffering in animal experiments and the reduction of animal use.'.

I do not intend to detain the House for long, but the RSPCA considers this to be a matter of considerable importance. It is in no way criticising the membership of the Animal Procedures Committee, but it is concerned about the fact that it needs to have the instruction that it shall from time to time go into the question of those licences that are granted in the category of substantial severity.

It is believed that the committee, as the Minister has laid out, has a great responsibility, but I want to return to the point that I made earlier. Yes, we do have to give it the widest discretion, but it is important that the Bill should spell out the kind of duties that we expect it to perform. After all, that is the responsibility of this House and it is why we are here tonight.

The Committee will comprise eminent persons with all sorts of experience, some from the animal lobby and some concerned not so much with animal welfare as with research. There will be a need to look at all licences granted in the substantial severity category, and I want an assurance that the closest consideration will be given to the question how the committee will be provided with sufficient information to make the decision——

Sir Dudley Smith: I have a certain amount of sympathy with what my hon. Friend is saying. However, does he agree that those on the committee will be men and women of the highest distinction and, inevitably, busy people? Can we really expect them to become bogged down in reviews and approvals of licences when the expert inspectors will have already done their work?

Of course, there will be instances when it may be necessary to consult the committee, but people may shy away from serving on it if they think that they will be bogged down in the routine of checking licence applications.

Mr. Fry: I understand what my hon. Friend is saying but refer him to an earlier amendment relating to the inspectorate. I do not in any way doubt the efficiency of the inspectorate, nor do I deny that the membership of the committee will comprise people of the highest calibre. I have been trying to explain that, with the large number of existing licences and the need for revision—especially those in the substantial severity category—even with the best will in the world 18 inspectors will have their work cut out.

I moved the amendment because I believe that there should be a clear injunction upon the committee to have an overall responsibility for licences in the substantial severity category——

Mr. Corbett: As I said two or three times in Committee, having established the committee and having confirmed its independence, we should be careful of the circumstances in which we lay specific duties on it—especially in view of the message that we received from the womb of that body yet to be born, that it would not carry out its duties over its shoulder, as it were.

Mr. Fry: I accept that. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not think that I intend to press the amendment to a vote. I believe that it is important that we should put on record what we expect of the committee.

There is a genuine fear that unless we do that, because the committee will have a great deal to do and many responsibilities, it may not embark upon what I consider to be a fundamental part of what should be its work.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to move the amendment. I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say.

Mr. Mellor: As my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) knows, it will be for the committee to determine what it wants to consider, and it will be perfectly free to do that. After all, that is what we have always wanted. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said, we must not seek to rein in the committee and specify what it should consider if it is our wish that it should be a properly independent watchdog committee that can report to the public on how the Act is working.

However, the Secretary of State will want to ask it to look back at the question of the substantial severity banding and how discretion has been exercised. In pursuing that investigation, the committee will be entitled to ask for such information as it wishes from the Home Office, or, indeed, anyone else. We shall, of course, give full co-operation. In my judgment, we now have a basis on which the Animal Procedures Committee can undertake its work responding to requests for advice from the Secretary of State and determining itself what other matters it wishes to examine. It has a duty on it, under clause 20(2), which provides:

"In its consideration of any matter the Committee shall have regard both to the legitimate requirements of science and industry and to the protection of animals against avoidable suffering and unnecessary use in scientific procedures."

That is the balance it must help us to strike and plainly the issues set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough are crucial to achieving that goal. My hon. Friend made clear that he was raising the matter at the behest of the RSPCA and that the RSPCA had no quarrel with the committee. I should think not, since the scientific and legal advisers to the RSPCA are on the committee.

Mr. Fry: As I am satisfied by my hon. Friend's reply, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 21

GUIDANCE CODES OF PRACTICE AND STATISTICS

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amemdment No. 36, in page 14, line 14, at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State shall consult the Animal Procedures Committee before publishing or altering any information under subsection (1) above or issuing, approving, altering or approving any alteration in any code issued or approved under subsection (2) above.'.

The aim of the amendment is to ensure that the Animal Procedures Committee is fully involved in the crucial work that has to be done on the codes that will contain so much of the day-to-day learning under the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 25

POWERS OF ENTRY

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 16, line 32, leave out 'necessary by force' and insert 'need be by such force as is reasonably necessary'.

It was pointed out that, in enforcing the Bill, it would be inappropriate if a nuclear weapon were used to blow a hole in the door of a laboratory so that an inspector could see what was going on behind that door. It was suggested that we include reference to such force as is reasonably necessary. I have been advised by the draftsmen that this intention is inherent in the provision but, if inserting these words will bring peace between the warring parties, why not put them in?

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read

10.23 pm

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third Time.

I commend the Bill which, in proceeding through the House, has received clear and careful thought from a range of hon. Members on all sides. A necessary job has been done. Although the Bill came here after being carefully considered in the other place, manifestly further improvements could be made and have been made in Committee and during the course of tonight's Report stage.

This is an historic Bill. It is 110 years since the law on animal experiments was last changed. Tonight we are exchanging a hansom cab for a Rolls-Royce. The Bill makes many changes which will be for the benefit of sound experiment and animal welfare. Some of the changes, to which I shall refer, will have a far reaching effect. The project licensing system for the first time gives the Secretary of State and those who advise him the capability of determining whether or not certain work should be carried out and, if so, on what conditions. That committee will run in parallel, as the twin pillar of regulation, with the personal licensing system that exists under the 1876 Act. For the first time, breeding establishments are brought under control, so that the framework of control extends throughout the life of the laboratory animal, and we nail once and for all the worry people have had that their pet could end up on the vivisector's slab. Similarly within the laboratory we provide for the first time for continuous care for the animal while it is in the laboratory.

For the first time, a named individual is made personally responsible in law just as under the precedent of other legislation relating to safety at work one person has the obligation to ensure that the law is fulfilled. We have widened materially the number of procedures that are regulated by the Bill. It is an anomaly that scientific procedures such as the passaging of tumours or the preparation of anti-sera were not included in the 1876 Act because they were concepts unknown to the Victorians. We have made provision for a wider range of animals to be offered protection by the Bill, some of them in the womb.

We have taken advantage of the growth in knowledge that there has been in crucial areas such as alternatives to ensure that animals will be used only when it is necessary to do so. When it is necessary to use animals, that will be done only in accordance with the highest standards, and these standards will be higher than anything that prevails anywhere else in the world. To establish that, we have provided that there should be three severity bands, severity being a much wider concept than the old concept of pain. Only a limited number of permitted procedures will be allowed to go to the upper pain limit that is the standard limit under the 1876 Act.

There has been a decline of about 2 million in the number of procedures carried out on animals over the past decade. The Bill, by the sophistication of the machinery which it provides for analysing each and every project, offers a mechanism whereby there will be a further reduction in the number of animal experiments achieved. We can achieve that reduction while at the same time making it clear that we all long for the day when there will be no further need for animals to be used in medical experiments. Unfortunately, that day is a long way off, and we must accept that if we are to make the advances that we want in the conquest of disease, in understanding more about the mechanisms of the body and the central nervous system than we know now and in ensuring product safety, animal experiments will be required in the present state of our development.

It is clear—this is the crucial advantage of the Bill—that this measure has growth potential. It does not seek to freeze onto the statute book the standards of 1986. In 1980, 1975 and 1970 the number of animal experiments taking place was very much more than the present level. The state of human knowledge meant that some procedures had to be carried out then that are not necessary now, and some procedures will not be necessary in four, five or 10 years time that are necessary now. The important criteria set out in the Bill can change as circumstances change. Best practice will be made standard practice through the proper imposition of the arrangements in the Bill.

It will not be left to the man in Whitehall to decide these matters. Independent assessors and the Animal Procedures Committee—the representatives of both categories will be drawn from outside Government—will be making judgments and full reports will be made public with any changes in the important codes and guidelines being subject to the negative procedure in the House so that the House can always have debates on any matters that arise. Reports will be able to be made annually by the APC.

I have been the Minister who has had the privilege of undertaking the preparation of the Bill over the past three years. It has been possible to do that against the background of what is often seen as the unthinking and extremist element. There are many who have been devoted to the cause of striking the balance in the right place both inside and outside Whitehall. In bringing forward the Bill I have been served by a devoted group of civil servants and members of the animal inspectorate, who have done all the work that has been seen in the Bill as it has passed through the House. The exercise has not been conducted behind closed doors in the Home Office. We have made our views public consistently over the past three years and we have not hesitated to change our minds when that has been appropriate.

I pay tribute to all the organisations that have assisted us from the research side, including the Research Defence Society, the Chemical Industries Association Ltd., the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industry, the Royal Society and many others. All these organisations have helped in the preparation of the Bill.

I should like to thank personally the moderate animal welfarists in the British Veterinary Association, the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons and the Committee for the Reform of Animal Experimentation. I should like to thank especially Lord Houghton and Clive Hollands, because no one has done more for animal welfare than they. I should like also to thank FRAME and its devoted leadership, Michael Balls, and the parliamentary group led by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). Without their support, a great deal of the refinement of the legislation would not have been possible.

Last, but not least, I thank the Opposition Front Bench. I do not want to embarrass them, but I must say that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is well known for his devotion to animal welfare. He is not a man who believes in shouting slogans when the practical business of legislating is to be done. He is not prepared to allow the best to be the enemy of the good. If the Bill works—I believe that it will—it will be due as much to the hon. Gentleman's efforts as to those of the rest of us.

The Bill is a great step forward in animal welfare, but it does nothing to threaten the vital medical research and other work that have done so much to make our society as safe as it is.

10.30 pm

Mr. Corbett: I thank the Under-Secretary of State for his generous remarks. I know that he will understand when I say, and mean, that, in every sense of the expression, the Bill has very much been a joint effort both in the House and, especially before the legislation came before us, outside the House. We have made the legislation better than it was initially.

We have enshrined the independence of the Animal Procedures Committee, which lies at the heart of better efforts to oversee justifiable animal experiments. We have agreed to write on the face of the Bill a requirement that a project licence shall not be granted unless the applicant can demonstrate that adequate consideration has been given to the use of non-animal alternatives. We have had pledges from the Under-Secretary of State on training and cash for it in terms of the Home Office inspectorate and the provision of the necessary support staff for that inspectorate.

We have improved the Bill in other smaller ways without acrimony and in line with the sensible consensus reached by the three organisations which in many senses can claim direct parenthood of the Bill—the British Veterinary Association, the Committee for the Reform of Animal Experimentation and the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments. We owe them a debt, especially when, regrettably, consensus is no longer a national ambition.

The Bill is a beginning and not an end, and I know that the Under-Secretary of State will accept that. We look to the Bill's provisions to achieve fewer experiments involving fewer animals. We look to the Bill to encourage better efforts to do away with tests, such as the LD50 and Draize, and research on beauty preparations which raise so much public anger. They are proper expectations. Everyone concerned with the implementation of the Bill, from the personal project licensees through to the members of the Animal Procedures Committee, should know and remember this: in many senses they and we are on trial.

Some steps still need to be taken. Dr. David Britt of the department of veterinary parasitology in Liverpool has said—I warmly support him—that what matters most is not legislation but "a heightened awareness by experimenters of the responsibilities associated with the use of animals and increased sensitivity to their needs and their capacity to suffer."

I commend Dr. Britt's suggestion to set up on a voluntary basis local institution-based animal research review committees made up of experienced researchers and those concerned with animal welfare.

The role of those committees would be to examine all welfare and ethical aspects of proposed projects before they were submitted for approval.

One view of those engaged in this type of research is that the best way to undertake their activities is to adopt a low profile behind Murdoch-like electronic protection. Dr. Britt makes the point that aloofness and conservatism in the scientific community may not be unrelated to the use of illegal, and, yes, sometimes violent, methods by the more militant animal rights campaigners. He calls for the research review committees to start a dialogue between scientists and the community. He says:

"Lay input might encourage scientists to be more reflective in their management and us of animals in experimental procedures.

He then recounts the experiences of such committees in Sweden and North America.

I hope that those words will commend themselves to the Minister so that, if there is a response, he may encourage a trial with such committees and if necessary offer help with administrative costs.

I hope also that major companies with research laboratories, and universities, may now volunteer for such experiments. I believe that only by being more open, and demonstrating the concern for animal welfare that they claim, can scientists start to achieve a better understanding of what they are about and better understand and respond to the widespread concern about what now goes on behind their fortified walls.

I want also to make a plea to those concerned with animal welfare. I believe that the Bill has narrowed the ground between the wings of a disparate movement. There have been many divisions, and that has not been in the interests of animal welfare. Lord Houghton and Clive Hollands in particular have done much for a long time to try to bring people together. I hope that all those in the movement who want to see an improvement in the welfare of animals used for experiments will use the Bill as an opportunity to meet. I hope that they will discuss the Bill and perhaps agree about how they can constructively give it a chance to work. The Bill needs critical friends rather than critical enemies.

We shall all look to the Minister in particular to ensure that the training needed by the Home Office inspectors in the various specialties is provided and adequately funded. We shall hold the Minister to pledges that the inspectorate will have sufficient support staff adequately to carry out the field activities as well as the load of paperwork.

I remind the Minister that our expectations for increased research into the use of non-animal alternatives cannot be fulfilled against the background of successive and long-term cuts in Government funding for basic research. It has been calculated that since 1980 the buying power of research funding has fallen by between £70 million and £280 million at 1982-83 prices.

Charities now provide about £90 million a year towards research, but that funding must at best be short-term and ad hoc. No charity can guarantee that next year it will be able to provide the funds that it has provided this year. Long-term research is about people. It is about being able to guarantee to people that one has sufficient funding to cover a project lasting for three, four or five years.

We also need better and more work on the refinement of the design of the experiments, and better systems to ensure that those taking part in them have proper and relevant qualifications and the competence to be licence-holders. There is a great hole in the training of those at present involved.

The one thing that I regret about our work on the Bill has been the shabby, shoddy, yah-boo politics of the Liberals and the Social Democrats. The Liberals and Social Democrats have repeatedly told us on other occasions that they are above such things.

An inaccurate, misleading and disgraceful leaflet was issued on behalf of Liberal Members, claiming:

"This Bill will almost certainly leave animals in a worse position than before."

At no time during the passage of the Bill have they sought to justify that idiot claim. The leaflet added:

"Liberals are determined to oppose this Bill."

Let us see whether they have done that. The replacement Member of the Standing Committee, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), attended seven out of nine Committee sittings; and I do not criticise him for that. However, he was not present to oppose the Liberals and SDP Members when they opposed the Second Reading of the Bill. When we discussed the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) to ban tobacco experiments, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor did not say a word. When we had a debate about beauty cosmetic testing, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor did not make a speech. Instead he made four interventions varying in length between 16 and 59 words. I genuinely congratulate the hon. Member on his brevity; no doubt he was hoping to succeed more by stealth than by full frontal assault.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) made all sorts of wild accusations on Second Reading and deservedly received criticisms from both sides of the House, and he did not make his scheduled appearance in Committee. Doubtless he did not appear because of the embarrassment felt by his right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who, as a qualified general practitioner, must have taken part in and accepted the need for some animal experiments.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South said on Second Reading:

"I want to see experiments and the health of everyone improved."

However, he did not say under what conditions or how many experiments he wished to see. He claimed that the Bill

"does little to protect laboratory animals, to reduce animal experimentation or to promote alternative methods of experimentation."—[Official Report, 17 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 103, 105.]

He was wrong on that count then and he is wrong now.

I should like to offer this quotation to the the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South and his hon. Friends to consider:

"No matter how strongly the law may be drawn, and no matter how rigidly it may be enforced, at the interface of the scientist and his subject, only the attitudes of the scientist are important. A heightened awareness by experimenters of the responsibilities associated with the use of animals and increased sensitivity to their needs and their capacity to suffer will achieve much more for laboratory welfare than new legislative measures . . ."

Those are the words of Dr. David Britt of the department of veterinary parasitology at the Liverpool school of tropical medicine. There is more honesty in that view and a better prospect of achieving our ambitions than the crude attempt of the Liberals and the Social Democrats on the basis of their misleading and inaccurate accusations to try to polish up a few votes at the next general election.

It is no wonder that in the remarkable document issued in the name of Liberal hon. Members——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Read it.

Mr. Corbett: I will read it. The document states:

"It is impossible to explain in detail the Liberal policy and action on animals."

Mr. Mellor: I would like to remind the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) about that remarkable document. Did the hon. Gentleman also know that that document caused Dr. Balls of FRAME to write and inquire how the Liberal party could produce such a document? He wanted to know where it would be possible to explain the Liberal policy in detail. He wrote to the leader of the Liberal party on 10 March but has not yet been favoured with a reply.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I remind the House that we are discussing the Third Reading of the Bill and that remarks should be related to the contents of the Bill.

Mr. Corbett: No doubt at some stage we will learn of the reply of the leader of the Liberal party to that important letter.

I conclude by saying that I hope that the Bill and the Animal Procedures Committee which stands alongside it, will achieve better results than the Farm Animal Welfare Council. The House got it wrong. Battery cages are still used. Indeed, the EEC proposes to reduce the amount of cage space for each bird. Sow stalls and veal crates are also still used. Nobody can claim that the welfare codes, which are supposed to help, have achieved what they should have achieved. I hope that the Minister will not forget that, and that he will determine that, at least in his area of responsibility, he will do better. I know that he wants to do better.

I should like to thank the Minister publicly for his open-mindedness and willingness to listen at all stages of the Bill. He has lost nothing through that, although, for reasons that he will understand, I shall not be able to speak for him in Putney in the next general election campaign.

We gave the Bill a critical welcome. Not all of those criticisms have been met, but I advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to give the Bill a fair wind against the background of it leaving us good scope to check and challenge what happens in its name. We intend to do just that, so that we can move at best speed to fewer experiments on fewer animals.

Sir Dudley Smith: I should like to echo what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said about the cheap opportunism of the so-called alliance in this matter. He said that we had some extraordinary comments on Second Reading and some none-too-helpful ones in Committee. There are now rumours that it will vote against Third Reading. I hope that that is wrong. If not, I do not know how it has the face to do so.

The alliance's attitude contrasts strongly with the highly responsible one shown by the official Opposition. It is all too easy, with a Bill of this sensitivity, to try to make political capital out of it. The Opposition resisted that temptation and behaved most honourably. We had an excellent Committee because party lines were crossed and helpful suggestions were made. The Opposition should be congratulated on how they conducted their case.

What Liberals have said and what the document that has been referred to says is claptrap. The Bill takes Britain ahead of any other country in Europe in the protection of animals in experiments. That is a notable achievement of which all who have contributed should be proud. I have been in this place for many years and I cannot remember any legislation which was so intimately identified with a Minister, let alone a junior Minister. He has pursued the matter with the utmost diligence and vigilance, got groups together and talked to them. This is very much his baby. He has pushed the Bill through the House and is to be congratulated on his success. His is a remarkable achievement, and I hope that those in authority will take due note of that fact.

Not least of my hon. Friend's achievements was his getting the moderate animal organisations together. I should like to pay tribute to them for their helpful comments and responsible attitude. They contrasted sharply with the irresponsible organisations, which are fortunately small in number. They do more harm than good for their cause in their extreme efforts to convince the Government that we are all ogres and torture animals just for the sake of it.

Now, only essential experiments will be allowed. I believe that the number will continue to decline, aided and abetted by the Bill. We have heard that numbers are already on the decrease. All who have participated in discussions on the Bill want animal experiments to be replaced completely in the longer term. We realise that they cannot be replaced at the moment. As I have said before, many of us will probably not live to see animals replaced in experiments. But one day that will come about, and this is a definite move in that direction. That is why we should be pleased to have had support from organisations whose main aim is to ensure that animal experimentation should eventually be totally replaced.

This is an emotional and sensitive subject. It pays to have sensible and valuable discussion as well as detailed consideration. It is not a matter for vote grubbing—it is one for the human conscience. Anything that can be done to save life and curb suffering—provided that it can be done properly, carefully and with respect for the animal — deserves encouragement. This is common to all mankind. A person can suffer ills—sometimes terrible ones—and may need treatment, and his life may be extended if he gets the right sort of treatment. It is our duty to society to ensure that the best possible treatment is available to all our people. That is what the Bill does, and it does so responsibly, having regard to the genuine anxieties of many people who feel that perhaps there have been too many animal experiments in the past.

The Bill has my best blessings for the future. It is not perfect and will perhaps be improved in the months and years to come. But, as the hon. Member for Erdington said, it is a definite start, and it will proceed from there. In those circumstances, it is right that every hon. Member, irrespective of party, should back it tonight.

Mr. Livsey: The alliance believes that the Third Reading should be rejected, and we propose to put the Bill to the vote. It was wrong for the Front Benches to suggest that we would do so simply to indulge in emotional politics. In my view they were trying to make hay out of the situation——

Mr. Fry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Livsey: Certainly not. I have only just begun my speech. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give me a chance to get going.

We all agree that the Minister has been sympathetic to the subject of animal welfare, and I would not dream of attacking him on that score. The Bill sets up the Animal Procedures Committee and project licensing, both of which are good and I commend the work that has been done. In fact, I commed the work of the Committee and the conscientiousness with which it carried out its task. The only point I want to make is that the Bill does not go far enough.

Mr. Fry: In those circumstances, why have the hon. Gentleman and his SDP colleague been tumbling over themselves all night to withdraw the amendments that they tabled?

Mr. Livsey: It would be foolish not to admit that there has been some generosity in accepting amendments. I do not challenge that. But the Bill does not include reference to the LD50 and Draize tests, which were defeated in Committee. It is not strong enough on cosmetics and tobacco testing, and does not clarify the situation on warfare experiments. We have also had a long discussion on Crown immunity. In our view, all these mattes should have been included in the Bill.

Obviously, there are good points about the measure, but it does not go far enough. As a protest, we intend to vote against it.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that in its 1979 election manifesto the Liberal party made no mention at all of animal welfare. The so-called joint manifesto of the Liberal-SDP alliance in 1983 backed the idea of a standing commission on animal welfare and said:

"This would keep under constant and rigorous examination"—

it sounds like the Minister—

"all issues of animal welfare including experimentation on live animals".

If the hon. Member and his party feel so strongly about the Draize eye test and LD50 and cosmetic tests, why did they not move amendments at the Committee stage and, more important, why were those explicit commitments not put in their manifesto for the last election?

Mr. Livsey: The hon. Gentleman is holding up a single piece of paper. We had a manifesto for the 1979 election and many members of my party, certainly on our agricultural panel, have been campaigning hard for animal rights for a long time. The criticism of the hon. Gentleman is unfair. The Bill is inadequate and we will vote against the Third Reading.

Mr. Gale: I did not intend to speak on Third Reading, but having heard the sanctimonious cant from the Opposition — [Interruption] — from the opportunist Opposition, perhaps a little more needs to go on the record. I have the honour to chair the all party-parliamentary Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments. That is a genuine all-party group and I think it has the largest support of any of the Back Bench groups. It believes fervently that animal welfare is not a party political issue. The Committee stage of this Bill was refined, because in the main the debate was not party political.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) is unable to be present. He is on parliamentary business overseas. In our views on animal welfare, he and I are diametrically opposed, but the views he expressed in Committee were sincerely held and my hon. Friends would endorse that. That is in sharp and colourful contrast to the few opportunist remarks by the representative of the alliance who finally managed to take his place on the Committee, having replaced the hon. Gentleman who spoke on Second Reading and then gave up.

It would be quite wrong for me, on behalf of the all-party group, not to take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the enormous amount of personal courage he has shown during the years he has worked on the Bill to bring it to its Third Reading.

I and all those who support FRAME believe that this is a non-party-political Bill that represents the true work of all those interested in animal welfare. It is perhaps significant that the animal rights movement has become a wholly owned subsidiary of the alliance that has, hocus pocus, put out animal rights leaflets supporting entirely the mobilisation of its demands, but that none of that work has gone into the genuine animal welfare representation that is in the Bill. By a huge majority the Bill will now get its Third Reading, whatever the opportunist opposition may do. The Bill has taken vast steps for animal welfare and will continue to do so for many years.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I shall be brief because I did not take part in the Second Reading debate or in the debate on Report. There is a degree of misplaced unanimity in the House. Those who have consistently opposed the abuse of animals in experiments should ask themselves whether the Bill will make much difference or, whether within a few years we shall have to debate the issue again. We may have to debate it again because all the abuses of animals in experiments in respect of cosmetics, tobacco, war and all the other abuses will still be happening. It has been said to me that this Bill regulates everything but bans nothing. That is true, and it is also true that the large number of vested interests which make a great deal of money from the results of animal experiments in a number of fields are prepared to live with the Bill. That indicates that the Bill has serious shortcomings. It does not achieve what many of those who are campaigning for animal rights wish it to achieve.

The Bill is the result of intensive campaigning by animal welfare lobbyists all over the country. The Government have sought to con them into believing that the Bill will meet their legitimate and justified fears about animal abuse in this country. They have not been conned. They are opposed to the Bill and they will continue to oppose it because it does not achieve what they wish it to achieve.

There is also a very large number of people, many of whom have sent letters and petitions and taken part in demonstrations in favour of animal welfare, who will not welcome the Bill because they genuinely believe that it will not achieve what it ought to achieve. They will continue to campaign for animal rights and for another Bill to replace not only the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 but the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

We have been debating the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill, which is inadequate but with which many of the vested interests will be able to live, but future legislation should look seriously at the abuse of farm animals and their treatment and at the food cycle that is the consequence of intensive agriculture and intensive feeding. It should also look seriously at the treatment of wild animals and the need, once and for all, to ban blood sports, the most barbaric of all animal abuses. This issue is very much on the agenda. It is not pushed off it by the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that that has nothing to do with the contents of the Bill. He must confine himself to its contents and to its Third Reading.

Mr. Corbyn: I appreciate that I must confine myself to the contents of the Bill, but I am merely pointing out, Mr. Deputy Speaker, its shortcomings.

In his Third Reading speech the Minister said that the hansom cab had been replaced by the Rolls-Royce. Wealthy people aspire to and use the Rolls-Royce. The poor have suffered for a very long time from having to use the hansom cab. I do not believe that the Bill achieves any great improvement in animal welfare.

Mr. Fry: One of the problems about legislating for animal welfare is that the attitude of the British public is ambivalent towards it. Of course it wants animal experiments to be reduced or even ended but it also wants an end to the many scourges that affect the human race. There is a genuine dilemma. The British public, just like the alliance, does not have legislative responsibility. That is the Government's responsibility, and that is what they have done in this Bill.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State drew the analogy between a hansom cab and a Rolls-Royce. How successful it will be and how far the Rolls-Royce will go depends not only on the driver but on the skill of those who maintain it. I want to enter two caveats about the Bill. Those who support the Bill decided that they would rely upon the advisory committee experts and the inspectors without including in statutory form the need for any other kind of technical advice. I remind my hon. Friend that the advisory committee on animal experiments said in its 1981 report that it believed that there was a strong need for experts to be available as referees when permission for animal experiments was requested. The Bill will have to be taken on trust to a certain extent.

Despite the ability of the inspectors and the eminence of the advisory committee, the range of knowledge which is required is so enormous that that small group of people cannot possess the necessary expertise. The support I have given to my hon. Friend the Minister relies on his assurances that the inspectorate and the advisory committee will seek advice when they need it. The long term success of the Bill depends upon that.

My hon. Friend has taken steps in the Bill to protect dogs and cats. The Minister may remember that I asked what happened to those people who illegally supplied dogs and cats to research establishments. From conversations with Home Office officials I understand that there is nothing to stop someone collecting a stray, looking after it and then selling it to a laboratory. The bill may not be able to deal with that but I am sure that the public are worried about it. It is all very well to penalise the research establishments which take the dogs, but those who sell them should also be punished.

Despite such caveats I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend on piloting the Bill and obtaining such a wide degree of agreement from both sides of the House. That is no mean achievement for any Minister. Some years ago, I tried to pilot a private Member's Bill through the House on this subject. I had the Minister's support and that is why he now has my support.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) that the Minister has displayed an ability to listen and to accept amendments and, when they were not right, to come forward with his own amendments. I think the Bill deserves a Third Reading. The Minister would be the first to admit that the Bill has still to be proved. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is correct when he says that we do not know how it will develop and it must be closely watched in the future.

It is a step forward. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) said that there are many good things in the Bill, but why is the hon. Member voting against those good things? Why would he vote to prevent the implementation of those good things? The answer is that for all the hon. Gentleman's fine words he is more interested in votes than animals. I do not think that is true of the bulk of the hon. Members. I have great pleasure in supporting the Third Reading.

Mr. Hancock: When we debated this issue on Second Reading I said that, for the first time in over a hundred years, the House would attempt to improve the lot of animals. On Second Reading and again tonight, the Minister legimately said that people from all sides of the animals welfare campaign had been brought together to try to get that ambition realised and that major step forward was achieved.

Regrettably, on Second Reading and again tonight, more in sorrow than anything else, I find myself unable to believe that the major step forward has taken place. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) gave the reasons why those major ambitions, held by many people, have not been realised.

Experiments may still continue to test cosmetics and tobacco — the LD50 test and the Draize eye test. Because of this it is legitimate for any Member of the House to continue to oppose legislation, even at this late stage. Surely we have a legitimate right to oppose something which we do not believe has fulfilled the ambitions that many of us wanted to see realised. I am amazed that so many Conservative Members should refer to speeches made in Committee. Regrettably, I could not serve on that Committee — [Interruption.] — as I was already serving on a Committee that sat on 27 occasions, during which the only speeches made by Conservative Members came from Ministers. We were discussing a major plank of Government policy. Before Conservative Members start quoting remarks made in Committee, they should ensure that their own house is in order. It was arrogant, and it showed a cynical disregard of an hon. Member's right to express a certain viewpoint to deride an hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Mellor rose——

Mr. Hancock: I shall speak for only another 30 seconds.

Mr. Mellor rose——

Mr. Hancock: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Mellor: I can appreciate the hon. Gentleman's embarrassment in giving way, but he should understand why he is being derided. He is being derided not for opposing the Bill but for his empty-headed opportunism in merely quoting against the Bill half-mouthed propaganda about alcohol and tobacco without ever putting forward a viable alternative to our proposals. The hon. Gentleman is being derided for the total absence of any coherent thought on the part of the alliance parties. They are merely trying to gain empty populist advantage out of the issue.

Mr. Hancock: The House has gained little from the Minister's attempt to push home his already foul point. On Second Reading I spoke for more than 20 minutes, making many of the points that the alliance wanted to be included in the Bill. However, the Minister chose not to explain why the Government did not support their inclusion.

If the Minister is so sure that the Liberals and the SDP are supported by the majority of people in the country why on earth are the majority of hon. Members disregarding their voice? Perhaps only the alliance party represents the public's view. It is most regrettable that the Opposition spokesman has not pursued our line. Similarly it is amazing that the Minister has failed to respond to the public clamour for more ambition and drive to be associated with the Bill.

We shall vote against the Bill, because the ambitions that many people had for animal welfare rights have not been fulfilled. I wanted the Bill to do more, and I am sure that is the view of my colleagues. I am not in the least embarrassed by my stance, as it is wholly honourable.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On Second Reading, I spoke at some length, explaining why I could not support the Bill. Since then it has been in Committee, but the changes that I wanted have not been made. As a result, I am still unable to support the Bill.

The Bill still allows animals to be used for experiments connected with warfare. That is the most obscene, unacceptable and obnoxious use of animals. Animals are tortured pitilessly in the interest of discovering how best human beings can kill each other. Last time I spoke, I cited several examples of the pain suffered by animals. However, I shall cite one other, that I did not use then. A document which I shall come to shortly refers to experiments using tear gas and says:

"The peripheral sensory irritant . . . was tested on the eyes of conscious rabbits at Porton Down: effects included 'diffuse redness of lids with moderate swelling of the lids', 'swollen tissues encroaching over periphery of cornea'; and in some cases 'gross opacification of the cornea with deformity and/or ulceration'."

Not many hon. Members will have experienced tear gas, but we have seen the consequences of it and it does not take much to imagine the suffering that those animals experienced during that experiment.

I am pleased to say this evening that I understand that on Thursday last week the Federal Republic of Germany outlawed animal experiments for warfare purposes. What a great step forward. If only the Minister and his right hon. and hon. Friends could have told us this evening that exactly the same would happen in the United Kingdom. Why is not it happening here? No doubt we shall be told that warfare experiments, particularly chemical experiments, are carried out at Porton Down to learn about defence, when in actual fact they are carried out to learn about offence.

As hon. Members well know, it was recently agreed in the United States that a new generation of chemical weapons should be built and developed, with the consent and agreement of the NATO allies. One would hope that the Government would disagree with those developments but after the events of the past week and the ease with which the President of the United States obtained the consent of the Prime Minister of this nation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he must confine himself to the contents of the Bill.

Mr. Boyes: Exactly. That demonstrates that the chance of any opposition is small.

To experiment on animals for the sake of humans who want to go to war is unacceptable. I can do no more than to quote the words of Dr. Robert Sharpe in a document on warfare experiments published by an active organisation called Mobilisation for Laboratory Animals. He wrote:

"The suffering which human beings inflict upon each other during the course of war is the responsibility of the human species alone, and there can be no justification for the pain inflicted upon other animals to test ways of harming and destroying ourselves."

If mankind were to destroy himself, that would be the responsibility of mankind. It has nothing whatever to do with animals.

Let me conclude by paying tribute to the many organisations that have provided much research and good material to enable us to study the consequences of warfare experiments. The number of letters that I have received on that matter show that their efforts are being well rewarded because more and more people are becoming aware of the obscenity of what happens at Porton Down. Recent opinion polls show that eight in 10 people are against the use of animals for warfare experiments and a whole nation in Germany is now against it.

Donald Barnes, a distinguished United States scientist, once said:

"The more I look back I see their greatest fear is in people finding out how the animals are treated and thereby initiating steps to correct that."

Another organisation has recently been spawned to help in the struggle to inform people about how animals are used for warfare purposes. Peace and Animal Welfare, whose general secretary is Mrs. Kitching, is now informing tens of thousands of people of the obscenity that is being carried out in the name of the British people. Many of us oppose the use of animals for those experiments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) dwelt on the analogy of the hansom cab and the Rolls-Royce used by the Minister. Rolls-Royce are developed for the rich and powerful, just as the Bill has been designed for the rich and powerful to protect their commercial interests. But more than that, the Bill is in the interests of the crazed pain-inflictors, who operate under the guise of scientists working in the chamber of horrors called Porton Down and any other laboratories in Britain. I shall never support such Bills in the House unless they outlaw the use of animals for warfare experiments.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I regret the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) from our deliberations tonight. Although he aggravates at times, he has an honesty of purpose and a discreet charm—which occasionally escapes him—and is a delightful person.

[Mr. Mark Hughes]

My hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) referred to the use of animals in warfare experiments. He assumed that, in Committee, his hon. Friends let that bit pass by default——

Mr. Boyes: No.

Mr. Hughes: Oh yes, that is what my hon. Friend said to the House. I trust that he has read column 88 of the Official Report of Standing Committee A of 6 March, when hon. Members on both Labour and Conservative Benches extensively discussed the use of animals in warfare experiments, with no unanimity across parties and a distinction across both sides.

On that occasion the Minister said:

"It would not be in breach of an assurance given in this House, but unlawful if any Home Secretary, while the Bill remains on the statute book, granted a project licence for that purpose."

That purpose was the use of animals in weapon experimentation. He continued:

"I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman"—

my hon. Friend for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller)—

"for providing an opportunity for me to say that. It can never be a permitted purpose, and any Secretary of State who purported to make it so without amending the Bill would be in breach of the law."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 6 March 1986; c. 88.]

Yet my hon. Friends are now saying that we have failed the House and the country and that by permitting the continuation of the use of animals in warfare experiments are in error as to law. There is no error as to intent because there is no one in this House who would want to continue those experiments without control. My hon. Friends are saying that this Bill, now at its Third Reading stage, fails to protect animals against such experiments. I am saying that those of us who are their Labour colleagues fought and won assurances in Committee on that matter. They may not ultimately accept them, but on a matter of judgment the majority of their colleagues in Committee accepted them.

My hon. Friends are perfectly entitled to vote against Third Reading on a difference of opinion, but let them not for one moment think that we said that we want those experiments to continue. We will not have that. i will not have it said of myself or my hon. Friends that we want to continue those experiments without control. We were assured that no Secretary of State would ever allow that to be a permittd purpose within the context of the Bill. Earlier this evening we debated and, on my request, forced a Division on the question that Crown immunity should be lifted. Without the lifting of that immunity an impetus to fear remains, and I regret that the Government could not accept that argument.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) was present at more Committee meetings than I was. Both of us suffered family bereavements, and I do not blame him for being absent occasionally. In Committee, a finely balanced argument was well rehearsed on the question of a total ban on LD50, Draize, cosmetic and tobacco experiments. Again, an honourable difference of opinion was the result. It therefore does not lie with one party or another in this House to make a political point; it is fraudulent for any party to do so. I hope that, as a newer Member of the House, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor will accept that it does neither him nor his party any good to say that only their members held certain views and voted a particular way. In my 15 years here that is not how animal welfare matters have been dealt with, and they will not be dealt with in that way in future.

Mr. Livsey: I never made that point in my speech.

We have objected to the Bill for objective reasons and said what they are. The hon. Gentleman mentioned LD50, the Draize test and other matters to which we objected. We are not making party political points.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the hon. Member for that, but regrettably many of the interventions of his hon. Friends appeared to imply that anyone who rejected the LD50 or Draize tests was a Liberal supporter. That has never been the position. The hon. Member should not underestimate the sincerity of hon. Members who have found faults with the Bill but who believe that so great is the advance that it makes overall that it is worth accepting a few blemishes. I should prefer to have had the Crown immunity removed and a few other alterations made. I do not believe that banning specific tests and procedures was the right provision. The idea was to give the Secretary of State a power to say that unless a procedure was justified it would not be allowed. That is the core of the Bill, and on that basis I shall wish it a fair wind and vote for the Third reading.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Libya

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier in the evening, I twice raised the need for a Government statement. The facts as given in the past 10 minutes by Cruise Watch are that in the air there are 52 F-111s out of Mildenhall, 48 F-111s out of Upper Heyford, 72 tank busters from RAF Bentwaters and the bulk of the American tanker fleet from Fairford. If we are to believe that this is simply Exercise Elderforest it seems at best to be insensitive to a mindboggling degree. There should at least be a statement to the people in the vicinity of those are bases on what is happening. Will there be a reconsideration, even at this late hour, and will a Minister give the House a few explanations about the facts?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The hon. Member knows that Ministers' statements to the House are not a matter for me.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member raising a different point of order?

Mr. Boyes: Surely, we should consider the consequences last week, when a member of the Opposition Front Bench tabled a private notice question and asked for a statement, which Mr. Speaker in his wisdom turned down. I do not criticise Mr. Speaker, but we know what happened that day when the House was not informed about the F-111s being in the air. Exactly the same situation is occurring. Action has been threatened by the President of the United States——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member knows that, however serious the issues, a Government statement is not a matter for me. I have not been told that a statement will be made.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One cannot raise a point of order further to bogus points of order.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you advise us by what means these serious matters can be brought to the attention of the House and of the public?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those on the Government Front Bench have heard what has been said. It is not a matter for the Chair.

Statute Law Repeals Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

11.42 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill arises from a report of the Law Commission for England and Wales and the Law Commision for Scotland. In pursuance of their function to reduce the number of separate enactments and generally to simplify and modernise the law, the commissioners produced their 12th report in November 1985. They recommended that 135 Acts should be repealed in their entirety and that redundant provisions should be removed from 240 other Acts. The Bill would put those recommendations into effect and bring the total since 1969 to 2,300 enactments.

The Law Commission and the Joint Committee have performed work for which we should all be grateful. It is necessary from time to time to bring forward a measure to clear redundant material from the statute book. This is not a glamorous task but is necessary to the continuous process of legislation.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I thank the Solicitor-General for his introduction and endorse his comments about the commissions' valuable work. Normally, when we discuss consolidated legislation late at night, we deal with matters which, in all candour, are as dull as ditchwater. This is not consolidated legislation, although it has been through the same procedure. It removes old and time-served statutes from the law. The notes on the Bill make entertaining reading. They contain a fund of material for speeches, but I shall not draw upon it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House. —[Mr. Maude.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 58 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed without amendment.

Social Security Bill [Ways and Means]

11.45 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Social Security Bill, it is expedient to authorise the charging to income tax under Schedule E of payments of statutory maternity pay under that Act or, in Northern Ireland, any corresponding provision contained in an Order in Council under the Northern Ireland Act 1974.

I shall speak very briefly, but I understand that the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) may wish to make some points, and I shall of course reply to them to the best of my ability.

In December the Government published a consultation paper proposing the replacement of most of the present state maternity allowance scheme with a scheme to be called statutory maternity allowance, modelled on the lines of the statutory sick pay scheme. Following the outcome of the consultation on that document, I last week gave details of a revised proposal for a scheme to be called statutory maternity pay, which would bring together much of the present state maternity allowance scheme with the present maternity pay scheme, operated by the Department of Employment, within a single more integrated scheme to assist women giving up employment in order to have babies.

An integral element in both schemes is to make the maternity allowance taxable, in line with general Government policy that income replacement benefits should generally be subject to tax in the same way as other income. That is already the case for such things as retirement and most widows' pensions. The present Government has introduced changes which make most unemployment and supplementary benefit for the unemployed taxable. Statutory sick pay has made the great bulk of sick pay taxable in the case of short term sickness, replacing much of the previous state benefit scheme.

Maternity pay is already taxable. The statutory maternity pay scheme, incorporating much of the present state maternity allowance scheme, will make that part of what is currently maternity allowance taxable, in line with our general policy.

The case for making such benefits taxable is clear both in logic and equity. I think that it is widely accepted on both sides of the House. The basic proposition is that people who have the same annual income, regardless of whether it is all from earnings or partly from earnings and partly from benefit, should pay the same amount of tax. That is what the proposed scheme, and the taxability of benefits under the proposed scheme, will enable us to achieve in this case in the same way as in a number of other cases.

The details of the new scheme have now been laid out in new clauses tabled to the present Social Security Bill. They will no doubt be the subject of a measure of debate in Standing Committee when we reach new clauses next week. The present resolution paves the way for an important aspect of the proposals, namely the taxability. I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): The first point that I should like to make is that the Minister said that the proposals had been announced last week. I am not sure on which day the announcement was made, because the press release is not dated, but it was on Thursday that the matter came to my attention. He said that a new clause had been prepared. However, so far as I am aware—and I checked a little earlier this evening—it is not on the amendment paper. We are therefore debating a paving proposal for a proposition that is not before us. Some of my questions might therefore have been unnecessary if the proposal had been before us.

I shall confine my remarks within the context of the proposal to make statutory maternity pay taxable and to the reasons for the order. As it is to be taxable, I should like the Minister to comment on the rate at which it is proposed to be paid. As I understand it, in 1980 the maternity allowance was cut by 5 per cent. in lieu, the Government said, of taxation that was to be brought in subsequently. Will the Minister tell us what would be needed to restore the present payments in real terms by that 5 per cent. so that we may have a degree of comparison between what is proposed and what might otherwise have existed?

I believe that in 1981 strong assurances were given—and the Equal Opportunities Commission has drawn attention to this—by the Government, that the proposed changes would introduce a system of benefit which would reflect 100 per cent. of normal pay. The reason for making it 90 per cent. of normal pay was that an earnings-related supplement to maternity allowance would make up the difference. In the comments on the consultation document, the EOC and other organisations have drawn the Government's attention to the fact that these assurances were explicitly given and repeated, and yet it appears from the proposals that it is still intended that the new scheme should be 90 per cent., not 100 per cent. of normal pay. What will the losses be in keeping the figure at 90 per cent.?

The proposed rate of payment seems to be the one that corresponds to the lowest rate of statutory sick pay and is only some 85p more than the existing payment. That hardly seems to be enough to make up for the fact that the proposed sum will be subject to tax and national insurance.

One point about which I should like clarification—as I cannot carry the figures in my head any longer as they have become rather more complicated—is whether the sum is lower than the normal rate at which national insurance contributions would be charged. Therefore, in a sense, if national insurance contributions are to be charged on that sum, that would be exceptional.

I should also like the Minister to give us more up to date information about the number of losers who are expected and about the amount that the Government expect to save. Under the original scheme, although some 5,000 to 10,000 women were said to be gainers, it was envisaged that some 75,000 to 85,000 would be losers. Has that figure been improved or is it worse? The amount saved has been estimated to be about £34 million to £39 million, and I should like to know the Minister's estimates of the present savings.

The Opposition support the contention of the EOC among others, that if there are savings they should go to improve the level of maternity benefit overall, rather than merely going as savings to the Government. That is especially important because there is still clear evidence that there are likely to be twice as many still-births among the poorest families. There is much more likelihood of early death among the poorest families, and it is therefore essential that there should be adequate provision for those families during pregnancy. In 1984 a hospital survey showed that for diet alone to be adequate — and we recognise that there may be limitations on direct comparisons — the amount needed then was some £13·87. An updated figure on that basis would be about £14·70. That is a substantial chunk out of the money that is intended, in theory at least, to meet all maternity needs.

There are other criticisms of the proposal. As the Minister will be aware, we are deeply worried about mistakes that are known to be made in payments of statutory sick pay and the extent to which people in small firms do not receive maternity pay, even under the present system. Most of those comments might better be made when we have the new clause.

The questions that I have asked arise out of the taxable nature of the proposal, and I would welcome the Minister's response.

Mr. Newton: I understand that the new clauses have been tabled tonight and will therefore be on tomorrow's Order Paper. I understand that it would have been helpful if the hon. Lady had been able to see them before tonight's debate, I hope that she will understand that we have modified the proposals quite considerably in response to the consultation, especially in trying to bring together the existing maternity pay scheme and the formerly proposed statutory maternity allowance scheme. That has inevitably meant a good deal of work, and it was not possible to table the clauses last week.

We made the statement on Thursday, as the hon. Lady said, and put a copy in the mail for all members of the Standing Committee, as the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) will know, so that they should have as much notice as possible, even without the clauses, of the general lines of our intentions. I hope that that will have been thought sensible and reasonable.

I should like to answer the hon. Lady's questions in fairly broad terms and write to her if I have any of the details wrong. My recollection is that restoration of the 5 per cent. abatement in the rate of the existing maternity allowance introduced in 1980 or 1981 would cost about £8 million and that the amount of money involved in the 90 per cent. versus 100 per cent. of maternity pay, given that current expenditure on maternity pay is about £70 million, must be about £6 or £7 million. If I have inadvertently misled the hon. Lady—the figures are taken from my memory rather than from my brief—I shall write to her.

The hon. Lady mentioned the suggestion that the flat rate of statutory maternity pay would be the same as the current lower rate of statutory sick pay, which is £31·60 per week, and suggested that that was only 85p different from the rate of sickness benefit. The current rate of sickness benefit is £29·15 per week, and the difference is £2·45. If I am inadvertently misleading the hon. Lady, I shall write to her. Perhaps she is comparing the current rate of statutory sick pay with the rate of state sickness benefit and therefore of state maternity allowance, which will come into effect in July.

I have compared the present rate of statutory sick pay, payable from the beginning of this month, with the current rate of maternity allowance, which has been payable since November. There is a good deal of room for confusion as matters change during the year because of the rather silly fact that statutory sick pay upratings take place in April whereas all other social security benefit upratings take place in November. Not least of the advantages of the proposals that we have tabled for aligning the tax and benefit years is the fact that that type of anomaly will be removed and, from 1987, everything will go up in April.

In any event, the hon. Lady's comparison does not tell us very much, whether 85p or £2·45, because it ignores the Government's basic proposition that all of these benefits ought to be taxable in fairness to those who derive the same amount on income over a year in ways which do not include an element of social security benefit. That is the basic fact to which I would cleave in putting forward this proposal.

Anyone with a weekly income of only £31·60 would not pay national insurance contributions as that is more than £6·40 a week below the current lower earnings limit. It is also in the nature of events that a woman receiving statutory maternity pay would not necessarily be receiving any other income from her employer that would bring her within the national insurance net. If by some chance she was — and it would be possible in relation to occupational sick pay — it would rank for national insurance contributions if she was above the lower earnings limit.

From that it follows that anyone receiving the higher rate of what will be statutory maternity pay — the six weeks of earnings-related benefit corresponding to the existing maternity pay scheme—will be likely to attract national insurance contributions in respect of those payments as they are likely to be a significantly above the lower earnings limit.

Our present estimate is that about 94,000 women who would have qualified for maternity allowance under the present rules will not qualify for either SMP or the state maternity allowance in 1987-88. These are almost entirely women who were not working when their pregnancies began. In other words, they are people for whom maternity allowance was never designed. It was designed for those in work at the time in order to enable them to give up work in the interests of their own health and that of their babies. Those considerations clearly do not apply to someone who is not working, even when the pregnancy begins. Part of our worry about the present scheme, and one of our reasons for wishing to change it, is that it is poorly targetted in terms of the basic aims that it was expected to fulfil.

Against that figure — and this picks up the hon. Lady's point about ploughing money back into the scheme — about 20,000 women who do not qualify for the present maternity allowance will be brought in — not necessarily to the statutory maternity pay scheme but to the residual state maternity allowance scheme — by the introduction of the recent work test that we are proposing in respect of residual state maternity allowance.

They will be gainers, as will two groups to which the House will, I think, attach some importance. We shall enable what are known as opted-out married women to receive statutory maternity pay. At present they cannot get state maternity allowance, because by definition they have decided not to pay full-rate national insurance contributions, and that excludes them from short-term benefit.

A smaller group, which I know has the sympathy of the House, will also be brought within the changes that we are proposing. As the House knows, there has been some controversy in recent months about the fact that pregnant widows cannot get maternity allowance because it counts as an overlapping benefit with widows' allowance. We propose to remove that overlapping benefit provision to enable pregnant widows to receive statutory maternity pay. That small but sympathy-demanding group will also be assisted by our proposals.

The financial calculations are somewhat complex—as I am sure the hon. Lady knows from some of the discussions we had last year about the extension of statutory sick pay—because of the way in which various items crop up in different bits of the account. It is estimated that the flat-rate element of statutory maternity pay will account for payments by employers of about £112 million, and that is apart from payments of the earnings-related element equivalent to the present maternity pay scheme. It is also estimated that DHSS expenditure on maternity allowance will be reduced by £174 million.

There will be offsetting expenditure of £19 million on extra sickness benefits and supplementary benefit payments. The hon. Lady will see from those figures that there is a modest increase in the amount paid out. Against that there is the taxation issue. I do not think that the hon. Lady asked about this, but perhaps I should tell her that we expect the tax yield from SMP as a whole will be about £30 million. Of that, about £15 million is, as it were, the equivalent of existing taxation because maternity pay is already taxable. That means that the net increase in tax revenue, the amount corresponding to the introduction of taxation on the maternity allowance part of the maternity pay scheme, is around £15 million. I hope that that is reasonably clear to the hon. Lady, but if in seeking to respond as willingly as I have to her questions I have in any way issued a misleading statistic I shall see that she receives a correction.

Mrs. Beckett: I shall be able to read the Minister's words in the Official Report, but it would be helpful if he could set out the financial calculations. Although I tried to follow with care the figures he gave, I find it a little hard to see how 94,000 women, or a net figure of 75,000 women, can fail to qualify for benefit altogether, although the Minister argues that there is little in the way of financial savings. I should like him to look at that rather more carefully.

My second point is one that I should have asked the Minister first time round and I forgot. It is not entirely clear to me from the press release, but I have taken it from the way that it reads, that the original intention with the statutory maternity allowance and the separate maternity pay scheme was that one might be deductible from the other. That proposal caused a great deal of anxiety during consultation, but I now assume that it will disappear because the schemes are amalgamated. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Newton: There may be some misunderstanding. It has always been the case that where maternity allowance was payable, maternity pay made up the difference to reach the 90 per cent. total. If that were not done, somebody could get more in maternity pay and maternity allowance than she would be getting by way of normal pay if she were at work. Clearly, that is neither satisfactory nor sensible.

We certainly do not envisage that there should be payment of a flat rate equivalent to the present maternity allowance. To make it clearer, take as an example the £31·60 figure. On top of that there would be a payment of 90 per cent. of normal earnings. During the six weeks there would be 90 per cent. of normal earnings and for those qualified for the 90 per cent. over the six weeks, there would be 12 weeks at the flat rate of £31·60. There would not be six weeks during which both the 90 per cent. and £31·60 were payable together at the same time. That is for the same reason as not paying maternity allowance and maternity pay as separate figures.

Mrs. Beckett: As I recall and as I understood from the documentation that I have available—obviously not as extensive as that available to the Minister—the point being made was that people who were not receiving maternity allowance might nevertheless be deemed to be receiving it and would suffer a loss. A number of people responded to that danger during the consultation process and it is not clear whether or not it has disappeared.

Mr. Newton: The technical restraint on the debate is the taxability of the proposed scheme. The hon. Lady is going into some fairly fine detail, and it might be better if I were to undertake to communicate with her at a later stage rather than to detain the House longer tonight.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Social Security Bill, it is expedient to authorise the charging to income tax under Schedule E of payments of statutory maternity pay under that Act or, in Northern Ireland, any corresponding provision contained in an Order in Council under the Northern Ireland Act 1974.

SAFETY AT SEA BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—
Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Safety at Sea Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses incurred by a Minister of the Crown under the Act and any increase attributable to the Act in the sums so payable under any other Act;

(b) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS (SERVICES)

Ordered,

That Mr. Churchill be discharged from the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) and Mr. William Benyon be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Oxford Polytechnic

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

12.10 am

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): Oxford is well known for its university which, over seven centuries, has established a worldwide reputation. Oxford is less well known for its polytechnic, which has not had the advantage of being in business for seven centuries but which is, nevertheless, fast making a name for itself.

I have the privilege of representing the constituency in which Oxford polytechnic is located and I should like tonight to draw attention to its achievements as well as to some of the problems that confront it. In so doing I wish to pay tribute to, and to thank Dr. Clive Booth, the director of Oxford polytechnic, who has prepared for me a most excellent brief for this evening. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science will appreciate that his Department's loss is clearly Oxford polytechnic's great gain.

Oxford illustrates as well as anywhere the complementary roles of a great university and a thriving polytechic. The polytechnic has many special features not to be found in most universities. These include the opportunity to study at a wide range of levels from below degree to postgraduate, to study part-time as well as full-time, and in many applied and vocational subjects, some of which — such as architecture, catering management and planning—are not available in the university.

The polytechnic has a unique and highly popular modular course in which students can combine subjects from similar or widely differing fields. It has very strong links with the local community and industry. Like all polytechnics, it is accountable through many external academic and professional bodies for the quality of its work, and their reports speak highly of its achievements. The polytechnic's students are significantly above average in their success in obtaining employment after graduation.

Oxford polytechnic is a shining example, as I am sure my hon. Friend will agree, of academic efficiency. Its expenditure per student in 1984-85 was 8 per cent. below the average polytechnic and 24 per cent. below the highest spenders. Let me emphasise that these figures, which were produced by the polytechnic finance officers group, are adjusted to allow for differences in the mix of subjects studies, so they are genuinely comparable figures.

Not only is the polytechnic spending well below the average but it has achieved, in advance, the targets for student-to-staff ratios that are set by the National Advisory Body on the advice of Her Majesty's inspectors. It has achieved these levels of efficiency by exercising stringent economies and by teaching students in larger and larger groups.

But these economies have also had a measurable effect on student performance. Oxford polytechnic will shortly be publishing a research study which shows that over the period 1980 to 1985 student achievement, as measured in the termly examinations, fell steadily. This was in spite of an increase in the quality of the student body as measured by their general certificate of education advanced level grades. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that this is a matter not for congratulation but for deep concern, specifically because the fall in achievement correlates with increasing class size and the relationship is highly significant in statistical terms.

The evidence reinforces that recently assembled by the Council for National Academic Awards, based on hundreds of course courses in the public sector. In its report on resources and standards, a copy of which has been sent to my hon. Friend, the council registered its concern. The standards of courses approved by the CNAA are required by the council's charter to be comparable with university standards. The CNAA's function is thus to offer public reassurance about the quality of public sector courses. But this CNAA report makes sombre reading. I do not have time to quote extensively from it but the council do point to the many problems caused by the sharp reductions in the available resources per student in recent years. The council concludes:

"The Council believes that serious consequences will follow if there is a further decline in the unit of resource; and secondly, if action is not taken in the longer term to raise the unit of resource and capital equipment allocations to levels that will sustain quality."

Oxford polytechnic, in common with others, continues to face a deteriorating situation. I shall deal with Oxford polytechnic's 1986-87 budget problems. These have arisen because it is self-evident that the Government's expenditure plans have made inadequate allowance for inflation and the way inflation affects academic institutions.

The expenditure required simply to maintain the existing courses exceeded income by some £300,000. The governing body has had to consider savings which demonstrate the difficulty of finding economies in a polytechnic which is already poorly funded. The proposed savings included the early retirement of academic staff even though the polytechnic has already achieved the staffing levels recommended by HMI and has lost 40 academic staff within the last two years. A reduction in non-academic staff levels has been considered and yet this level is already below average. Another consideration was a reduction in library opening hours. However, because of past economies in the teaching staff, students have to rely increasingly on private study. To reduce to the already ungenerous library opening hours will hit those students hard.

Another saving which is being considered is a reduction in industry visits and field work. That would be on top of the savings made in 1975 and 1979. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science who is to reply will appreciate the difficulty of running vocational and applied courses without adequate industry visits and field work. It is self-evident.

These are some of the economies under consideration but they make it clear that the cuts strike at the heart of student education. Oxford polytechnic has the sympathetic assistance of the county council. I am glad to say that the council has agreed to meet some of this year's deficit and, as a result, the worst cuts will be avoided. It cannot be right that a higher education institution of national importance should depend on the willingness of local ratepayers to top up its budget.

Oxfordshire county council, given its own circumstances, has understandably had a policy of not topping-up Oxford polytechnic, although it has come to the rescue on occasions and the polytechnic is grateful for that. However, the effect of topping-up is inequitable and impossible to justify as some polytechnics receive generous contributions from their local education authority and others receive little or nothing. That is not helped by the attitude of the Government and NAB which is, in effect, to pretend that topping-up does not exist.

The Green Paper on higher education said that universities and polytechnics should increasingly look for private sources of funding. I wholly agree with that proposition with which the polytechnic also concurs. The polytechnic has met with increasing success obtaining private funding through research and consultancy. However, the Confederation of British Industry and Engineering Employers Federation has confirmed in its responses to the Green Paper, as my hon. Friend the Minister is well aware, that industry cannot be expected to subsidise mainstream courses on any significant scale beyond their present level of subsidy.

I shall attempt to put the financial problems of polytechnics in a broader national context. Recently my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister drew attention to the fact that under this Government, the number of students in polytechnics and colleges had grown by 40 per cent. Thanks to the efficiency of the institutions, however, that has been achieved by a much less than commensurate increase in resources. For example, between 1980-1981 and 1984-1985 polytechnic expenditure fell from £3,600 per student to £2,800 per student, which is a reduction of 22 per cent. in real terms.

In the same period, university expenditure per student fell by a few percentage points. Indeed, the stark differences between the universities and the polytechnics were recently brought out in a paper published by the Department of Education and Science entitled, "Comparison of Funding across Sectors". It shows that even after discounting 30 per cent. of the universities' budgets for research, the polytechnics and colleges received 20 per cent. less per student. I fail to see how a Government who have often reinforced their support for polytechnics and for the particular courses that they offer can justify that disparity.

Oxford polytechnic's difficulties are compounded by the inadequacies of its capital budget. This year, the amount earmarked by the Department for 1986-1987 is £776,000. That is a hopelessly inadequate sum for a major higher education institution that is attempting to cope with large teaching groups, changes in the balance of work, and the introduction of new technology into its science, engineering and vocational courses. It is less than the amount required solely for replacing outdated and broken-down equipment, which at Oxford polytechnic is estimated to amount to about £1 million per annum.

The situation has become so serious that the dean of technology is now having to consider complete withdrawal from a subject area, since the polytechnic cannot hope to maintain standards in all areas of science and technology on the Government's present capital budget. It is interesting to note that a university of similar size to Oxford polytechnic would receive from the University Grants Committee three or four times the amount earmarked for the polytechnic by the Department.

One result of the inadequacy of the capital programme is the severe pressure on accommodation. The polytechnic in Oxford is now accommodating 30 per cent. more students than the Department's space standards indicate should be accommodated. That means severe wear and tear, which is exceptionally heavy and which puts pressure on the maintenance and cleaning revenue budgets. It is a vicious circle of the most unappetising sort.

I turn briefly to the future. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, the NAB's officers have recently issued plans for the 1987-88 year as a basis for consultation. The NAB officers have had to make assumptions about the resources likely to be available, and they have quite reasonably assumed that, after all the economies made by polytechnics and colleges in the past six years, the amount spent per student must be protected. The result of protecting the amount per student is a planned reduction in intakes of 9,500 students. That figure has, not surprisingly, attracted much publicity, and I welcome the recent statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that he hopes that those cuts in places can be avoided. But I must warn my hon. Friend the Minister that the 9,500 students cannot be accommodated unless matching resouces are provided. The loss of student opportunity if those places were not to be provided would be very sad indeed. At Oxford polytechnic, the NAB plans would perforce include cuts in computing, construction, mathematics, business studies, catering, modern languages and the in-service training of teachers. All of these are applied courses of central importance to our country's economic success. How can it make sense to cut them?

I conclude on this note. In a recent television interview my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that he would be willing to make extra money available for purposes where he could be satisfied that they would be used wisely. If that is so, I urge my right hon. Friend to support extra funding for polytechnics. Understandably, they feel undervalued by the Government. My right hon. Friend claims to value higher education, which is closely linked to industry and commerce. That is exactly what the polytechnics are providing and they are doing so with great efficiency. They deserve our material, as well as our moral support.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) for giving the House this opportunity to debate the affairs of Oxford polytechnic. The distinctive role and formidable achievements of the polytechnics are not always as well known as they should be. The popular perception of the polytechnics is too frequently as the poor relations of the universities. In fact they are at the head of a thriving and successful collateral branch of the higher education family with their own independent household, means and interests. They merit a better and more extensive press.

I am particularly glad that it should be in relation to Oxford polytechnic that this opportunity arises, because it epitomises many of the typical virtues. My hon. Friend, who of course knows the polytechnic more intimately than I, has alluded to many of its achievements already this evening. But perhaps I, who know it more by its national reputation, although I have visited it informally, could single out three which refer back to the intentions which led to the creation of the polytechnics in 1966 and which are the hallmark of their distinctiveness today.

First, Oxford polytechnic is comprehensive in its intake and breadth of provision. Roughly a quarter of its advanced students are studying for qualifications below degree level. Over 10 per cent. of its advanced students are part-timers, a substantial proportion of whom are local mature students.

Secondly, the polytechnic's emphasis is on technical and vocational work—on application rather than pure abstraction. Over 85 per cent. of its advanced students are on technical, scientific and other vocational courses. Many courses have been devised in collaboration with, and in response to the needs of local employers.

Thirdly, the polytechnic is the valued collaborator of local industry, not just as a supplier of training needs, but as a consultant with practical expertise to contribute in its own right. It provides everything from a consultancy service on catering management, to energy studies for local schools, to the development of computer-aided management systems.

Therefore, I am happy to accept and to endorse my hon. Friend's high estimation of Oxford polytechnic. It is an institution of many qualities and with an important contribution to make to local and national needs.

The kernel of the case made by my hon. Friend is that these qualities are now perceived to be threatened by financial stringency. In particular the polytechnic faces a deficit on its budget for 1986-87 which may necessitate the finding of substantial savings to the detriment of existing provision. The moral which my hon. Friend draws from this is that the resources planned for the public sector of higher education as a whole in 1986-87 are inadequate and are being spread too thinly, both in that respect and for equipment.

My hon. Friend will, I hope, understand if I do not attempt a detailed analysis of the management and financial circumstances of Oxford polytechnic. They are matters beyond my Ministerial responsibility. I certainly do not wish to challenge my hon. Friend's judgment that it is a well-run institution, nor the judgment of those within the institution itself and the maintaining authority who have managerial responsibilities, that the budget for 1986-87 is a tight one.

However, I cannot refrain from quibbling with one small detail of my hon. Friend's presentation. I notice that he did not quote from the letter from the local education authority which suggested that there was a possible saving of £100,000—a third of the shortfall—on catering and cleaning. However, I know that the polytechnic governors had serious doubts about the effectiveness of privatisation. I note that for the record, but I do not want to get involved in this local issue.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is, however, responsible within the context of the Government's plans for local authority expenditure generally for the annual determination of the advanced further education pool, which shares the cost of local authority higher education between authorities. My right hon. Friend is also responsible, in the light of advice that he receives from the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education, for determining allocations from the pool to local authorities in respect of their institutions providing advanced education.

Against that background it is pertinent to record that the allocation from the pool in respect of Oxford polytechnic in 1986-87—just over £11·5 million—represents a 6 per cent. increase on that for 1985-86. That is in line with the increase in the advanced further education pool as a whole between those two years and ahead of the Government's forecast of inflation. It yields a level of funding per student at the polytechnic at exactly the overall polytechnic average. Since 1983-84, Oxford polytechnic's allocation from the pool as risen by 18 per cent., roughly in line with inflation. That is not ungenerous.

If, nevertheless, Oxford polytechnic anticipates difficulties in living within its budget in 1986-87, I suspect that two particular factors may be playing a part. The first, which is also general to public sector higher education, is the inflationary cost—7 per cent. in a full year—of the 1985-86 further education lecturers, pay settlement. There are many who would argue that the public funding of the system should keep pace with its component costs, including its salary costs, even if they exceed the rate of inflation in the economy as a whole. I do not accept that argument. The award was made on the understanding that the lecturers' union would discuss changes in working practice that would lead to significant efficiency gains. Although they are the subject of current negotiation, those gains have yet to materialise. In the meantime, I do not think that higher education—and I stress that I am talking about higher education overall, rather than polytechnics in particular—can reasonably expect to be compensated by the taxpayer for additional costs which were incurred with open eyes and full knowledge of the funding consequences. The onus must be on higher education itself to contain the increased cost.

Oxford polytechnic, as my hon. Friend said, has also recently lost its topping up—the amount by which the maintaining authority had in the past supplemented the polytechnics allocation from the advanced further education pool.

I noted my hon. Friend's arguments about the whole philosophy of topping up but it would take much longer than we have available at this early hour of the morning to go into that. This is entirely a matter for the authority, which must decide in the light of its available resources and of local priorities whether to divert additional funds to the support of advanced further education.

I recognise, of course, that the diminution of income consequential on the loss of topping up may take a little time to assimilate and may entail some redeployment of resources within the polytechnic itself. But the Government, basing themselves on the advice of the National Advisory Body, are clear that the advanced further education pool is adequate to fund the advanced provision planned for in 1986-87.

More generally, it is clear that the polytechnics as a group are now operating a tight ship. the background to that is the sustained expansion of student numbers that has occurred in the first half of this decade to which my hon. Friend referred. Since 1979, the polytechnics have absorbed a 37 per cent. increase in student numbers and in consequence have achieved a substantial and very creditable gain in efficiency. Their improved efficiency has been reflected in a sustained tightening of the student-staff ratio until, in 1984-85, it stood at 11·5:1, just short of the 12:1 target for the public sector as a whole established by the National Advisory Body as a basis for its planning. There has also been a commensurate fall in polytechnic unit costs of just over 18 per cent.

Oxford polytechnic has followed that trend. As my hon. Friend observed, it has also achieved a student staff ratio of 11·5:1, which, because of its subject mix, is consistent with th 12:1 target for the sector as a whole. Unit costs at Oxford polytechnic are below the overall polytechnic average.

My hon. Friend deduces a threat to quality from this substantial fall in unit costs. He cites as evidence an unpublished research paper—although I understand from him that it will soon be published—tracing a correlation between student performance and resources at Oxford polytechnic over the period 1980 to 1984. I have not seen the paper, but I welcome work in this area. This is a complex question on which the evidence is so far scanty. The more evidence the better. What evidence I have seen, however, does not lend support to any simple formulation of the relationship between resources and quality. I am more inclined to sympathise with the observation of a recent paper on the same subject by the Council for National Academic Awards, submitted as evidence to the National Advisory Body, which was careful to stipulate that the relationship was not a mechanical one.

It depends crucially, for example, on the extent to which resources are being exploited to the full. In the case of advanced further education at the beginning of the decade, they were clearly not. There was substantial under-used capacity—in part because student demand which was anticipated in the 1970s and for which provision of accommodation and resources had been made did not materialise, or materialised at a slower rate than expected. The decline in unit costs is largely a measure of the greater intensity with which resources have been used since. Thus the National Advisory Body, in its strategy advice to the Secretary of State about higher education in the late 1980s and beyond, published in September 1984, judged in the light of the views of Her Majesty's inspectorate and the validating bodies, that the fall in unit costs was not in itself a ground on which it could argue for an increase in the funding per student then obtaining, although it did recommend that there should be no further planned reduction.

My hon. Friend has argued that the spare capacity is now filled up and that, in the case of Oxford polytechnic, the bottle is full to overflowing. He concludes accordingly that the Government should allow no further deterioration in the unit of resource in 1987-88. In so doing, he echoes the views of the National Advisory Body.

I should stress at once that no decisions have been taken about the level of funding available for public sector higher education, nor will they be taken until the autumn. That said, I have to record my scepticism of the unit of resource argument embraced by the National Advisory Body and the relationship it predicates between funding and student numbers—that to add a student costs the same wherever added, and to remove a student saves the same wherever substracted. Common sense suggests that the real world is not like that. How can it be when a proportion of the system's costs are attributable to its buildings and other facilities, which are relatively inelastic to demand?

Only if the system, in each and every one of its constituent parts, was operating at full capacity would an approach based on maintaining a particular level of funding per student make sense. Even that supposes—and it seems to me fraught with difficulty—that it is possible to discern what level marks the Rubicon of acceptable quality. But the system is not operating at full capacity. By contrast with the tight efficient polytechnic ship, the student-staff ratio elsewhere in the local authority higher education sector stood at 9·6 : 1 in 1984-85. That is indicative of substantial spare teaching capacity. Prima facie, therefore, there must be scope for redeploying resources towards the polytechnics.

I dwell on this point, which Ministers have repeatedly made in the light of the National Advisory Body secretariat consultative proposals, because it seems to me that the efficient allocation of places and resources is the key to orderly planning. It could almost describe the National Advisory Body's raison d'être. To place undue emphasis on the average level of funding per student diverts attention away from the effectiveness of the system. By assuming that the system is disposed to best effect now, it effectively excludes consideration of how it might be better organised to make resources go further and to sustain quality.

This is no service to Oxford polytechnic nor to other institutions of similarly high quality. It is axiomatic that we should fund such institutions at a level consistent with preservation of quality and so as to build on existi strengths. I do not see how that purpose would be fulfill by the National Advisory Body secretariat consultati proposals which would instead divert money away fr Oxford polytechnic by curtailing the planned number students for which it is funded, in the way that my ho Friend has mentioned. It would be a folly to do so wh there are unused resources elsewhere in the system. F that reason the Government look to the National Adviso Body to bear these factors in mind as it continues planning for 1987-88, culminating in the submission advice to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State th December.

These considerations have ranged more broadl perhaps, than the immediate problems which my ho Friend has raised in the case of Oxford polytechnic, b I hope that they have helped to place them in a rather mo comprehensible context.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Tourism

1. Mr. Roger King asked the Paymaster General if he will detail the number of foreign tourists entering Britain in 1979 and 1985 and also estimate the number of jobs created from this source.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The number of visits to the United Kingdom by foreign residents rose from 12·5 million in 1979 to 14·6 million in 1985. In the six years to June 1985 the number of employees in the hotel, catering and leisure sectors, which most directly depend on both foreign and domestic tourists' expenditure, rose by around 101,000. In addition, self-employment has grown, for example, by around 19,000 in the hotel and catering industries between 1981 and 1985.

Mr. King: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that extremely encouraging reply. Does he agree that if tourists moved outside the general area of London into rural areas more jobs and more opportunities in the tourist sector would be established?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that the English Tourist Board has used the additional money that we have given it to increase by about 20 per cent. this year the subvention to regional tourist boards. We have asked the tourist authorities, in making use of section 4 grants, to concentrate on areas of high employment where there is potential for growth. We have taken on board my hon. Friend's valid point.

Mr. Madden: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the retention of the Settle-Carlisle railway line would attract more people to this country and promote employment? What is he doing to persuade the Secretary of State for Transport to keep this important line open?

Mr. Clarke: I remember from one of my previous duties the interest that arose in that railway the moment the railway authorities proposed to divert traffic from it. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is continuing to look with interest at all the proposals to save this picturesque route.

Mr. Adley: In view of the Americans' facility of self-delusion, will my right hon. and learned Friend turn his mind to current opinion in the United States, which appears to see this country as a seething cauldron of unrest? Will he, as a politician, do what is perhaps not fair of us to expect the official British Tourist Authority to do and bluntly point out that if the Americans really want an unsafe holiday surrounded by violence the best thing they can do is go to Florida?

Mr. Clarke: I am afraid that there is a wave of feeling in the United States that it is not safe to come to Europe. That could lead to a decrease in the number of visitors to Britain. The tourist authorities have been bringing trade and travel representatives and journalists to this country to reassure them that our airport security is good and that safety levels here remain much higher than in United States cities. A formal political reaction might arouse more concern than reassurance. A concerted attempt to control terrorism, especially at airports, will do more than anything else to reassure American visitors.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the rather small number of new jobs to which he referred in his main answer are basically low-paid, seasonal, insecure and unskilled? Is he aware also that, in exactly the same period when that small number of jobs were created, we lost 1·75 million high-paid, regular, good jobs which earned more money for this country from abroad? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman also aware that in West Derbyshire it will take 30 years to erase the quadrupling of unemployment in the tourist industry during that period?

Mr. Clark: The figure I gave was for the increase in those trades most directly concerned with tourism. People know that well over 1 million jobs are dependent on tourism in one way or another, and the figures I have given in no way refer to the people who work in retailing, public transport or other sectors of the economy, where tourism helps. Those are real jobs—36,000 for men. They are perfectly good jobs and, with respect, the hon. Gentleman is out of touch with events and with the times if he goes back to dismissing tourist jobs as somehow not real jobs. West Derbyshire depends very heavily on tourism, and the hon. Gentleman's remarks will be carefully noted there if he tries to denigrate the industry.

Mr. Butterfill: Has my right hon. and learned Friend yet made any decision on the difference between the increase in funding he will allocate to the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board?

Mr. Clarke: Yes we have. I shall give my hon. Friend the precise breakdown in correspondence later. We have agreed an allocation to the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board and the amount for grants under section 4.

Labour Statistics

2. Mr. Canavan asked the Paymaster General what is the current total number of unemployed people in the United Kingdom.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): On 6 March 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,324,000.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister now tell us the truth and admit that there are over 4 million unemployed, most of whom are being thrown out of work because of the Government's disastrous economic policies? The Government then fiddle the books to try to conceal the true length of the dole queue, which is costing the country over £20 billion a year. Why cannot that kind of money be channelled into public investment to create real jobs for the unemployed people of this country?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. The number of real jobs and people in employment in this country has risen in every quarter over the past three years. Over that period about 1 million new jobs have been created.

Mr. Fallon: Is my hon. Friend aware that under the initiative for the long-term unemployed on Teesside some 70 per cent. of those called in by jobcentres are getting a positive result? Will my hon. Friend pay tribute to jobcentre staff and assessers and invite the Opposition to visit some of this long-term work instead of criticising it as simply tea and sympathy?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. Our restart initiative to bring help to the long-term unemployed around the country should be widely welcomed. It will help direct those unemployed people to the many jobs that are available.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the Minister realise the serious damage now being done to morale on the youth training scheme and the community programme by the prospects of unemployment for some of those reaching the end of their courses and in the light of the figures that he has just given? Does he agree that the manufacturing and construction sectors, especially, should deliberately be expanded in order to match the number of people who are eager and well-equipped to work in them?

Mr. Lang: I have just told the House that employment in this country has risen by about 1 million in the past three years. This suggests that there are a large number of jobs for people completing youth training schemes and the community programme. About two-thirds of YTS graduates go into employment or training and twice as many people coming off the community programme go into jobs as other long-term unemployed people.

Mr. Marland: Is my hon. Friend aware that recently, after extensive research, The Mail on Sunday estimated that one-fifth of those who are currently claiming unemployment benefit simultaneously work in the black economy?

Mr. Lang: We take very seriously any suggestion of fraud and would rigorously investigate any cases for which evidence is brought to us. My hon. Friend might like to know that we have expanded the fraud investigation staff by some 50 per cent. recently, and we plan further expansion.

Mr. Evans: Is the Minister aware that the figures he has given to the House, massaged and fiddled though they are, are an absolute condemnation of six years of Tory Government incompetence? Will the Minister also confirm that when we get the June labour survey figures, as a result of the latest fiddle that the Government are embarking upon, we shall have a substantial drop in the percentage of those unemployed? Will the Minister also say why the monthly labour market statistics are now leaving out such valuable information as the numbers of long-term unemployed? Is the Minister not ashamed of those figures?

Mr. Lang: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the long-term unemployed amount to approximately 1·4 million. On the matter of fiddling the figures, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us which of the changes that have been made to the unemployment count he would reverse if the Labour party ever came to power?

Business Expansion Scheme

3. Sir Peter Blaker asked the Paymaster General what steps he will take to ensure that the current business expansion scheme does not disadvantage hotels.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): Under the Budget proposals for revisions to the business expansion scheme, hotel companies will continue to be eligible provided that they meet conditions on the backing of investments by property assets. Genuine risk-bearing investments will not be disavantaged.

Sir Peter Blaker: Will my hon. Friend assure me that the hotel industry will not be put at a disadvantage compared to other industries by the proposals in the Finance Bill? Can he say the same for the self-catering accommodation sector?

Mr. Trippier: I am anxious to give my right hon. Friend the assurance that he is seeking. Well planned hotel projects and projects related to tourism will still be attractive investments, and BES tax relief will obviously be a useful incentive. It is important to stress that BES was first introduced to attract those who would otherwise not have made safe investments to take the risk, and that is the reason for the tax incentive. The new proposals by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean that risk-free investments are excluded, as I believe they should be.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend accept that the business expansion scheme is admirable but suffers from one great defect—that the people who would be most likely to make such an investment are those most closely related to the people running the business? Will he speak to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether there is some device—for example, channelling through an enterprise agency—which will make it possible for parents to put their money into their children's enterprises?

Mr. Trippier: That point has been put to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor several times, but there is, of course, the additionality problem. My right hon. Friend has always said that such money would be invested in those companies in any event without the additional incentive of the tax relief. That is the argument, but I shall be happy to draw my hon. Friend's points to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Youth Training Scheme

4. Mr. Madden asked the Paymaster General what provision he will make for young people leaving YTS between April and September in the current year to help them into employment.

Mr. Trippier: Many young people completing one-year YTS this year will be offered a second year of training. Those who leave will have access to help from the careers service and jobcentres, and we aim to improve further the employment prospects of ex-YTS youngsters through the recently announced new workers scheme.

Mr. Madden: How many young people will leave YTS during the period from the end of this month to September? Is not the reality that if they do not have a job there is no alternative scheme? The Government are dumping these young people on the dole queues, deserting them and forsaking them.

Mr. Trippier: There might be an element of truth in the hon. Gentleman's claim were it not for the fact that in the recent Budget a new scheme was introduced called the new workers scheme. Approximately 170,000 people will complete their one-year YTS in the period to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Obviously the new workers scheme is complementary to YTS. If continuation places are not sufficient in an area the new scheme will apply. I understand that there are some 600 YTS continuation places available in the hon. Gentleman's constituency in Bradford. I hope that those places will suffice to meet the need. If not, the new workerss scheme will complement what is available, and YTS leavers will be eligible for those places.

Industrial Relations

5. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Paymaster General whether he will review the operation of industrial relations legislation passed since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We keep the operation of the legislation under constant review. We have made encouraging progress towards giving members a greater say in the affairs of their own union, a fairer balance of power between unions and employers, and better industrial relations.

Mr. Wardle: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the action attempted by SOGAT at Wapping contrasts sharply with the general reduction in the number of industrial disputes following the introduction of ballots? Would SOGAT be in its present difficulties with the courts if it had simply balloted the members it had instructed to strike?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. So far as I am aware, the only injunctions obtained against SOGAT—and certainly the sequestration of the funds—followed because it failed to ballot all its members to come out on strike. It is important that the Government have given union members the right to be consulted before they risk their jobs by becoming involved in strike action.

Mr. Leighton: When the review referred to in the main question is undertaken, will the Paymaster General accept that the majority of British people feel that if Mr. Rupert Murdoch can essay his current industrial butchery and have the law on his side, there is something wrong with the law? Does he agree that if a union such as SOGAT, which did not set out to break, ignore or be in contempt of the law, has every penny of its funds sequestrated within days of entering a lawful dispute following a ballot, the law is grossly unfair and badly in need of reform?

Mr. Clarke: SOGAT failed to ballot the wholesale membership, which it was calling out on strike. The union must have known that that was unlawful. It went before the court and failed to withdraw the blacking instructions or, since then, to purge the contempt. The union has simply failed to comply with a law that has great popular support and has contributed to the improvement in industrial relations in other industries. The Government defend the right of members to be consulted before they put their jobs at risk. SOGAT led its members into folly and cost them all their jobs.

Mr. Holt: While my right hon. and learned Friend is examining post-1979 legislation, will he also examine pre-1979 legislation, especially in respect of the undertaking given by one of the junior Ministers formerly in his Department to consider how legalistic and expensive the industrial tribunals have become and how out of touch with the working world?

Mr. Clarke: We certainly keep the working of the industrial tribunals under review. It is right that workers who have established themselves with an employer should have protection against unfair dismissal. We wish the proceedings to be as devoid of legalisms and as informal as possible. We also believe that the procedures should not be misused by people with frivolous or reckless claims, causing unnecessary expense to many employers.

Mr. Prescott: In view of the declared public sympathy of the Paymaster General for the printers' dispute, is he aware that the simple creation of new companies has swindled the employees out of £80 million in redundancy pay, thrown the right to strike and picket into confusion and allowed the sequestration of funds? According to Mr. Murdoch, that is all now possible under the Government's legislation. In the parliamentary reply that he recently gave me, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that, comparing working days lost through industrial disputes under the present legislation with the situation under the Labour Administration, over 118 working days more per 1,000 employees are lost in disputes now than under Labour? Is it not about time that the Government's anti-trade union legislation was reviewed and repealed?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's figures are virtually meaningless. They are an average, inflated in our case by the miners' strike in one year and in the case of the Labour Government by the winter of discontent. The number of disputes last year was the lowest for 50 years —the lowest since 1936. The number of days lost to February this year was the lowest for 19 years. The average figures are quite meaningless.

Mr. Prescott: They are the Government's figures.

Mr. Clarke: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, if he will allow me to answer it, there is a limit to the extent to which I can comment on the current dispute between News International and the various print unions. However, if I may speak generally, Fleet street over the years has been epitomised by extremely robust and incompetent management and extremely militant trade unions which have defended rackets of all kinds. I am constantly astonished at the way the hon. Gentleman keeps resorting to Fleet street as an example of the effect of his new industrial relatons legislation, which will sweep away our existing laws.

Registered Unemployed Persons

7. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Paymaster General what steps he takes to check that all those registered as unemployed are seeking work.

Mr. Lang: All claimants are asked about their availability for work when they first register as unemployed and subsequently if doubts arise.

I am not fully satisfied with the existing test, and I am exploring ways in which it can be improved.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend says that people must be available for work. However, he must know that there are several categories of people, such as mothers with young children or those who have taken early retirement, who draw benefit but are not seeking work and would not take a job if one were offered to them. Does my hon. Friend consider that the unemployment figures are compiled in a sensible manner? Will he change them?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There are, of course, others who are seeking jobs but do not feature on the unemployment register count. The labour force survey provides a better picture of the employment world and has shown the creation of a million new jobs in the past three years.

Mr. Haynes: Why do the Minister and the Government pursue that line about scroungers? This is a planted question, and that is what it is about. The Minister should have a word with his right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, now that he sits at the Cabinet Table at No. 10, with a view to providing real jobs and getting people out of the dole queue and back to work in the manufacturing industries — not as waiters or tourist guides.

Mr. Lang: I may be responsible for the answers, but I am certainly not reponsible for questions. A moment ago I mentioned the creation of 1 million new jobs—these are real jobs. I would be happy to send the hon. Gentleman a copy of our booklet "Action for Jobs", which underlines over 30 employment measures and training measures designed to help people into those jobs.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Has my hon. Friend read of the racket, operating out of Nottingham, which has been exposed by the national press? The unemployed, or rather some claimants under that guise, are bussed to other parts of the country to act as door-to-door salesmen and claim to help the disabled. Does my hon. Friend agree that to help those who are genuinely unemployed we should stamp on those malpractices?

Mr. Lang: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. I take his allegations seriously. If he has evidence to support this I shall be glad to see it. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that the number of cases where action has been taken against fraud has more than doubled in the past two years and prosecutions have risen by over 50 per cent.

Ms. Clare Short: I am sure that the Minister does not wish to mislead the House by partial quotes from the labour force survey. Will he confirm that, according to the analysis of that survey undertaken by the Employment Gazette in January 1986, we have the terrible total of 5,460,000 people in Britain who wish to have a job but cannot get one? Does the Minister also agree that as 41 per cent. of the registered unemployed have been out of work for a year or more it is not surprising that they do not seek work every day of every week of every year?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Lady is quoting selectively. The fact is that the labour force survey shows that the number of jobs in Britain has risen by over a million in the past three years. There are more people on the unemployment count who are not seeking work than there are those who are not on the count but are seeking work.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Minister accept that in the north, Scotland and in Wales there are wards where 40 per cent. of the work force are unemployed. The predominant concern is the lack of jobs and the debilitating effect that that has on young people and on those in the 50-years age group who see no future of work once they have been declared redundant.

Mr. Lang: I believe that there are pockets of high unemployment in all parts of the country. The Government's restart initiative, which will operate nationally from 1 July, will be helpful in this respect. It will draw in the long-term unemployed for interviews and give them help to try to find jobs.

It is significant that, so far, over 90 per cent. of those who have been interviewed have been offered a positive employment opportunity.

Tourism

8. Mr. Proctor asked the Paymaster General what contribution tourism makes to the United Kingdom's balance of payments position.

Mr. Trippier: The surplus of the travel account on the balance of payments was £600 million in 1985 compared with a deficit of £50 million in 1984.

Mr. Proctor: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to repudiate the Opposition attacks on those who work in tourism and who contribute substantially to the country's economic prosperity? Will my hon. Friend give a breakdown of the figures that he has just given?

Mr. Trippier: I am glad of the opportunity to repudiate what the Opposition have said about tourist industry employees. I wish that some of them had the nerve to address conferences on tourism and tell people who work in tourism that they do not regard their jobs as serious jobs.

Mr. Prescott: I worked for 10 years in that industry.

Mr. Trippier: In that case, the hon. Gentleman should be the last person to make the kind of remark that he has made in the past.

United Kingdom residents spend about £4·9 billion abroad, but overseas visitors spend about £5·5 billion in Britain. We are obviously anxious to increase the latter figure.

Mr. Warren: While awaiting anxiously the reply to a later question on the Order Paper on the subject of the Select Committee's report on tourism, may I ask my hon. Friend to acknowledge immediately that if tourism is as successful as he says it is, that which is given to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland should also be given to England, where the investment would realise far more?

Mr. Lang: I must applaud my hon. Friend's initiative. He knows that that part of the Select Committee's report was dealt with some weeks ago by my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. We intend to give a full and considered reply in the near future to the Select Committee's recommendations.

9. Mr. Knowles asked the Paymaster General when he proposes to reply to the recommendations of the Trade and Industry Committee on tourism.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have already announced the Government's response to the Select Committee's recommendations for an alternative tourist board structure in the written reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 27 February 1986. We are still studying the remaining recommendations in the Select Committee's report. As my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has just said, we hope to provide a considered response during the summer.

Mr. Knowles: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. The response in the summer is awaited with interest by everyone in the tourist industry. Does my right hon. and learned Friend have the tourist figures for last year, and is he able to say which foreign country contributed the largest single increase?

Mr. Clarke: Last year the number of tourists to this country from North America rose by 15 per cent. That is why it is important that Europeans generally, including ourselves, should reassure the American public that we are taking serious steps to cut down the risk of terrorism.

Mr. Leighton: If, as the Paymaster General has explained, grants to the tourist industry are to be made to those areas with the highest unemployment, what is their purpose? Is it so that foreigners can be taken on guided tours of our large pools of unemployed people?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friends and I despair of seeking to explain to the Opposition that there are good and substantial jobs to be won in this country by boosting our tourist trade. There is a whole range of jobs, from management right down to the equivalent of the factory floor, in every branch of hotel and catering and in all the associated trades that depend upon tourism. Some of the areas of high unemployment, including the north-east, are to be found in very attractive parts of the country that contain great buildings and historic cities that attract tourists. We are succeeding in making better use of those natural advantages and we are creating new jobs in those areas.

Mr. Hicks: In view of the contribution that tourism makes to regional economies, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is an urgent need both to widen the extent and to improve the quality of tourist attractions in areas such as the south-west in order to get away from the London, Stratford, Cambridge triangle?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that that should be one of our most important objectives. We are to open shortly a new British travel centre in London. Its main purpose will be to help visitors to disperse from London by telling them of the attractions of other parts of the country. We are asking the tourist boards to concentrate particularly on building up the tourist industry in areas of high unemployment which have a tourist potential and on seeking to extend the English tourist season.

Mr. Prescott: As I spent 10 years in an industry that deals with tourism, may I make it clear to the Paymaster General that I have no objection whatsoever to the development of employment in tourism? However, is he aware that most of the jobs in the tourist industry are normally low paid and part-time and that the conditions are bad? It seems that a great many Tory Members are tabling questions about tourism, when the House should be concerned about the loss of 1·8 million jobs in manufacturing industry that has occurred under this Government.

Mr. Clarke: It is no good the hon. Gentleman delivering his lecture to me about the virtue of tourist jobs. He should address it to the Labour chairman of the Select Committee and the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who have spent their time today denigrating the boosting of this industry. It is simply not the case that they can be dismissed in the way that he describes. Given a continuing decline in manufacturing employment—as there has been for the last 20 years as a result mainly of technological change, and that even now the economy is expanding in a healthy fashion—it is important that we look to the new jobs in this area. He will discover, if he finds out more about industry, that there is a whole range of jobs available — [Interruption.] — in tourist-related industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us conduct our proceedings in some sort of order. All these shouted comments from both sides of the House are not helpful.

Mr. McCrindle: For what reason did my right hon. and learned Friend take the unprecedented decision to reject perhaps the principal recommendation on tourism of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, concerning the structure of the British Tourist Authority and the various national boards, at a time when he could not conceivably have given adequate consideration to the well-researched recommendations of that Committee?

Mr. Clarke: We made a quick decision on that because we believed that continuing uncertainty about the structure of the boards would merely undermine their work during the forthcoming season. The issue gets raised repeatedly, particularly by the English members, who feel that at the moment somehow excessive aid is given to Scotland and Wales compared with England. A decision had to be taken about the structure so that those within the boards could get on with their work. We have increased our expenditure in all these areas. The figures which my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) asked for a moment ago are that we raised our grant to the British Tourist Authority by about £20 million, that to the English Tourist Board by about £10 million, and section 4 grants by about £9 million. So all the boards in their present structure have more resources to devote to the industry.

Tourism (Channel Tunnel)

11. Mr. Hayes asked the Paymaster General if he has estimated the effect that the Channel fixed link will have on inward tourism in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The fixed link will be a new international route and is expected to generate additional tourism to the United Kingdom. However, the likely increase has not yet been quantified.

Mr. Hayes: I had hoped that my hon. Friend would be more robust with some of the whingers on the Opposition Benches and make it absolutely clear to them that the increased tourism which will be created by the Channel link will be pan-United Kingdom and not just jobs for the prosperous south.

Mr. Trippier: Absolutely, and, at the risk of repeating myself, I obviously support all that has been said by my hon. Friends with regard to jobs in tourism. My hon. Friend makes a valid point. It is not just tourism in the south-east or around the area that the fixed link will be going through that will be affected, because our policy is to encourage greater dispersal of visitors on the inland tourist front. It will be better for tourism in Britain generally.

Mr. Boyes: While some of us hope that the Channel tunnel is never built, if it is we would hope that some of the tourists will come to the most beautiful region of Britain, the north-east of England. In the borough of Sunderland, of which my constituency is a part, 29,000 people are already out of work. The number of tourist jobs that will be created will be no compensation whatsoever for that number of unemployed. What we really want to know from the Minister for Unemployment is how many jobs building this tunnel will bring for the north-east?

Mr. Trippier: I think that it is wrong for the hon. Gentleman to deride in any way the jobs in tourism in the north-east. I take this opportunity of complimenting the north-east on the way in which it has developed and strengthened tourism. I am very familiar with the regional tourist board in that part of the country. It has been very successful. If the hon. Gentleman had listened a little more carefully to the reply to the substantive question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) he would have realised that this is wholly in tune with our overall philosophy. The tourists who are coming into Britain as a result of the fixed link will mean more jobs in the north-east as well.

Mr. Boyes: How many?

Mr. Trippier: It would be stupid and fatuous of me to predict an exact figure, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that over the last 12 months there has been a net increase in jobs in tourism of 50,000. Opposition Members must realise that we are talking about the most dynamic sector of the British economy in terms both of wealth and job creation.

Labour Statistics

12. Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General how many people were out of work in the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency at the most recent count.

Mr. Lang: On 6 March 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency was 3,570.

Mr. Knox: Is my hon. Friend aware that unemployment in my constituency has risen very considerably under the two Governments in the last 12 years? How does he explain this in an area where wages and salaries are, and always have been, low, productivity is high and labour relations are excellent?

Mr. Lang: The unemployment rate in the Leek travel-to-work area is 9·1 per cent. That is certainly higher than we would wish, but it is lower than it was a year ago. My hon. Friend might like to know that unfilled vacancies at Leek and Cheadle are up by over 50 per cent. on a year ago. I commend to my hon. Friend our booklet "Action for Jobs", which contains details of over 30 specific training and employment schemes which we have launched to combat the unemployment problem. In particular, for the low-paid in his constituency the job start allowance of £20 for anyone taking a job at under £80 a week might be appropriate.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that many people in the Staffordshire, Moorlands constituency have already got on their bikes to seek work? If the Minister got on his bike to go to look for a job in the adjacent constituency of Stoke-on-Trent, South he would find that unemployment has risen far faster under this Government than it did under the previous Labour Government. The reason for that is the failure of the Government to expand the economy. May we have some action to expand the economy in Stoke-on-Trent, South, and some action to help the economy in general?

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Gentleman will know that employment has also been expanding rapidly. As the right hon. Gentleman also knows, I was in Stoke-on-Trent yesterday at the national garden festival, and there I found substantial evidence of Government help, amounting to many millions of pounds. In the community programme, that money created about two thirds of the 1,500 or more jobs at the garden festival.

Retired Persons

13. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to remove retired people from the unemployment figures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: We have no plans to do so. However, we shall continue our endeavours to ensure that those receiving benefits are genuinely available for work.

Mr. Atkinson: Will my hon. Friend confirm that unemployment figures include retired people who do not want to work, are not seeking work, and have no need to work? Does he know how many people in that category are included in the unemployment figures? Does he not agree that it gives a false impression about how many people are presently unemployed?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. The 1984 labour force survey showed that some 60,000 people in the claimant count were not seeking work because they had retired. This underlines the fact that the unemployment count is not necessarily the best way of getting a true picture of unemployment.

Mr. Evans: Is the Minister not ashamed of the fact that all we have heard today from Tory Back Benchers are suggestions about how the unemployment figures, can be further fiddled? If the Minister wants to reduce the unemployment figures he should at least extend the job release scheme to those under the age of 62. That was the way it applied under the Labour Government.

Mr. Lang: The job release scheme has a useful role to play. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether it is the intention of any incoming Labour Government to reintroduce into the labour count retired people who have been removed from it?

Mr. Ralph Howell: Is my hon. Friend aware that his answer about the number of retired people included in the unemployment count is totally unsatisfactory? There is no sense in including such people in the figures. What plans has my hon. Friend for introducing a work test to establish exactly how many people are actively seeking work?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is knowledgeable in these matters and takes a close interest in them. He will have heard me say that we are unhappy about the adequacy of the availability for work test and that we are looking at ways of making it more effective.

Lost Working Days

14. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Paymaster General how many working days have been lost through strike action in the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A provisional total of 2·6 million working days were lost through stoppages of work due to industrial disputes during the 12 months to 28 February 1986.

Mr. Sedgemore: How does the Minister think the Wapping dispute will affect this year's figures? Would it not help the Government, the print workers, newspaper readers and even wretched Lobby correspondents upstairs if Mr. Rupert Murdoch were to be declared an undesirable alien and if his cringing sidekick, Mr. Andrew Neil, were to be given early retirement and a clapped-out print works in lieu of compensation?

Mr. Clarke: Inflammatory remarks by the hon. Gentleman will do nothing to help the position of anybody involved in the Wapping dispute. The hon. Gentleman is naming the only substantial dispute in private industry in Britain at the moment. He seems to overlook the fact that my reply to his question showed that Britain has had the least number of days lost in the period that he asked about for 19 years.

Labour Statistics

15. Mr. Dykes asked the Paymaster General what information he has about the methods used to compile unemployment figures in other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries.

Mr. Lang: The OECD published "Standardised unemployment rates" in 1985. This gives a detailed description of the sources and methods it uses in compiling unemployment figures from national sources and the rates derived from these figures.

Mr. Dykes: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer, but since on a pro rata basis the United Kingdom figures appear to be higher than those in the other large countries in the OECD and the EEC, should not we be the country to take an initiative in both those bodies to stimulate the collective economy?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. It is difficult to make comparisons between the different methods of calculating unemployment figures, but it is interesting to note that we have a higher proportion of our work force in work than almost any other OECD country. The OECD expects employment in the United Kingdom to rise faster this year than in any other major European country.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dykes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was present at Windsor for the arrival of their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be attending a state banquet in honour of their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain.

Mr. Dykes: As we are approaching my right hon. Friend's visit to Israel, and bearing in mind that we take over the EEC presidency on 1 June, may I ask her to consider carefully the advantages of another EEC initiative on the middle eastern settlement? Does she agree with many hon. Members that it is not only a matter of specific and important anti-terrorist measures, but of trying to deal with the fundamental problem of the middle east, and the Americans do not seem to be making progress in that more important area?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right to say that since the end of King Hussein's initiative there have been no new formal proposals. When King Hussein came here recently I was able to discuss certain practical steps with him and I hope to take those forward when I visit Israel in several weeks' time, and to be in touch with the United States about them. We take over the presidency on 1 July. I shall consider what my hon. Friend has said, but I think it advisable that we obtain more agreement on the steps forward before we launch on an initiative.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the action taken against the 21 Libyan students the beginning of further steps by the right hon. Lady's Government to isolate Gaddafi, including the imposition of economic sanctions and the denial of credits and subsidised foodstuffs from the EEC?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will later be answering a question about the deportation of Libyan students. It is an action which we felt was legitimate and desirable under all the circumstances. We are considering further matters about Libyan pilots in Britain and further action that we could take. He will be aware of the actions which the EEC decided to take and, of course, the meeting of Foreign Ministers continues.

Mr. Kinnock: In the light of that answer, may I ask the Prime Minister whether she has ruled out direct economic sanctions against Libya, as reported in the Daily Telegraph this morning? Does she accept that if that is true that would be cynical and inconsistent, given the support for the bombing of Libya last week?

The Prime Minister: The refusal to sell military equipment is, of course, a direct economic sanction of a specific kind which we took but which has not apparently been taken by all of the European Community. Sanctions as a whole will only work provided everybody operates them, but there are some that we take unilaterally, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware. Food matters have to be pursued through the EEC. We made our views known strongly to the European Commission, when it cut out the management committee and decided on special export subsidies for the sale of butter to Libya.

Mr. Kinnock: In that case, will the Prime Minister make further representations and put all possible pressure on our European allies so that they excercise the power that they must have to impose economic sanctions that are more effective against Gaddafi while not being so lethal towards his people?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we are doing just that and we are particularly concerned about the Commission giving special subsidies for exports of food surpluses to Libya, and we make our views known very strongly indeed.

Mr. John Browne: Will my right hon. Friend accept that a single bombing raid in itself is unlikely to stop terrorism? None the less, it does lay down to the terrorist a serious cost. Will she agree to lay down, in face of terrorism, yet more costs, such as the introduction of the death penalty for terrorism, and even introduce counter-terror activities, in our anti-terrorist operations?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the introduction of such a penalty would be a matter for this House. It has been debated on many occasions, but so far it has never got through. That would be the first thing that would have to take place.

Q2. Mr. Wallace asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wallace: During her busy day, has the Prime Minister noticed early day motion 74, in the name of a number of her right hon. and hon. Friends, condemning the alleged lack of balance in BBC reports of the raid on Tripoli? Will she take this opportunity to dissociate herself from that motion? In particular, will she praise Miss Kate Adey, who, in difficult circumstances, maintained the best traditions of objective news reporting?

The Prime Minister: The Government do not control the BBC. Hon. Members are as free to say what they like about the BBC, as is any other citizen.

Sir Edward Gardner: Will my right hon. Friend do everything that she can to persuade the United States Government that no country dedicated to the defeat of terrorism can any longer afford to allow the extradition of terrorists from its jurisdiction to be impeded or frustrated by the absurd doctrine that murder perpetrated with the alleged motive of political interest is no longer murder, and so cannot be used as a ground for extradition?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. The point has been forcefully made and will continue to be made. This matter is being increasingly recognised.

Mr. Dalyell: At what point did the Americans tell the Prime Minister that they were going to use anti-personnel cluster bombs?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated in statements and speeches last week, we set down certain criteria for the permission. The Americans selected the targets within those criteria. It was for them to choose the weapons which —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: —It was for them to choose the weapons to secure the defeat of those targets within the target permissions which we gave.

Q.3 Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bowden: Has my right hon. Friend seen the survey recently published by the National Council for Educational Standards, which shows that the examination results in ILEA schools are 30 per cent. below the national average, while at the same time ILEA spends over 40 per cent. more per pupil? Is this not a great indictment of a Socialist, dogma-ridden education authority? It is failing in its duty to the children it is there to serve.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. ILEA spends far more on the education of children than many other authorities, including those with similar problems. The results are not good. Indeed, they are worse than any other similar authority. Surely this shows that it is quiet wrong to tackle the education problem merely by pouring more money into it. Commitment and devotion are required on the part of the staff, with more choice on the part of parents.

Mr. Barnett: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Inner London education authority contains boroughs, some of which are among the most deprived in the country, that it is dealing with children coming from families speaking 145 different languages, that it has problems of quite a different nature from the problems of any other authority, and that the expenditure is entirely necessary? Speaking as a parent of children who go to ILEA schools, I am satisfied with the performance of their teachers.

The Prime Minister: I disagree with what the hon. Gentleman has said, particularly in the latter part of his question. He will be aware, for example, that ILEA will spend on each secondary school pupil in 1985-86 the sum of £1,933. Metropolitan districts, some of which have similar problems, will spend on average £1,113 on each pupil, and some of them get better results.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: In view of the failure of Foreign Ministers yesterday to agree on the banning of export rebates for Libya, is there nothing that the British Government can do to stop the use of taxpayers' funds directly to subsidise cheap food for Libya? Is not the management committee irrelevant, since on 15 March the Commission took it upon itself not to publish either the subsidy or the destination of cheap food?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary raised that matter with the Commission when it circumvented the management committee and gave a particular export subsidy for exports of butter to Libya. I am afraid that unless the rest of our Community partners agree with us there is nothing we can do alone.

Mr. Steel: Is the Prime Minister aware that on Thursday new regulations come into effect in the United States which will give the United States authorities control over high-tech hardware, software and personnel in this country? In view of the Attorney-General's opinion that such a claim is both illegal in international law and an infringement of our sovereignty, what protection will the Prime Minister give to British firms?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, there has already been a debate in the House on the subject, initiated by his colleague the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft). The position was stated in that debate and has been given a number of times since. In general we reject United States claims to extraterritorial jurisdiction in the United Kingdom. One of the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues is in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about a particular firm. That will be pursued.

Q4. Mrs. Beckett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the more conciliatory tone that the Prime Minister has offered of late mean that she now accepts that an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is not the best basis for foreign policy?

The Prime Minister: The best basis for foreign policy is what is in the British interest.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that millions of people up and down the country will welcome the fact that since the Budget, and, indeed, because of the Budget, there has been a sharp and continuing fall in the level of the mortgage rate?

The Prime Minister: Yes. That is very good news for all who are purchasing their houses. Last year the number of new mortgages reached 1 million for the first time. That is also good news for home ownership.

Q5. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wardell: Is the Prime Minister aware of any evidence that any of the 39 human beings, including women and children, who were killed in the American air raid in Libya had been involved in terrorist activities?

The Prime Minister: I indicated our view both in statements and in a speech. Terrorism thrives on appeasement, and Opposition Members are appeasers.

Q6. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: Is my right hon. Friend aware that after yesterday's meeting in Luxembourg many of us feel that our European partners' response to state-sponsored terrorism is woefully inadequate, particularly when, notwithstanding my right hon. and learned Friend's robust support, they could not be persuaded to close down the Libyan people's bureaux in various capitals, which are clearly being used as places from which terrorists act?

The Prime Minister: I rather agree with my hon. Friend. The European Community has gone further than it has been prepared to go before. It agreed to a severe cut in the size of people's bureaux throughout Europe. It agreed to confine members of those bureaux to the city where they are posted, to restrict the size of other official Libyan bodies to the minimum necessary and to apply a much stricter visa regime to Libyans. That is a good deal further than previously, but I agree with my hon. Friend that we should have liked a lot more to be done. We must consider how much further to go ourselves.

Mr. Buchan: Does the Prime Minister believe that her safeguarding of British interests includes allowing the Americans free choice in the nature of weapons to be used, as she said five minutes ago? Would this extend beyond the anti-personnel cluster bombs to nuclear bombs, for example? Do we get a clear answer on that?

The Prime Minister: It is a perfectly clear answer. We set down the criteria for targets which we believed were within legitimate self-defence. We were advised that the use of F111 aircraft was the best means of striking those targets. The precise methods that the United States uses is a matter for the United States within the criteria set down —[Interruption.] Of course it is a matter for the United States.

Mr. Buchan: In view of that inadequate reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Libyan Nationals

3.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the decision announced to the press today to expel a number of Libyan nationals from this country.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Twenty one Libyan nationals have today been served with notices of intention to deport on the ground that their deportation is conducive to the public good in the interests of national security. I took this decision in the light of the latest information about the active involvement of those concerned in organising Libyan student activity in the United Kingdom in support of the Gaddafi regime. I have authorised their detention while arrangements for their deportation are made. The House will understand that, in a matter affecting national security, it would not be right for me to disclose further details of the information available to me on which I took the decision to initiate deportation action. I shall not hesitate to use my powers under the Immigration Act 1971 to deport other Libyan nationals if evidence is received of their involvement in activities which might endanger security.

Mr. Kaufman: Mr. Speaker, may I first thank you for granting this private notice question following the failure of the Home Secretary to volunteer a statement on a matter about which his Department has saturated the media for the past seven hours.

I do not question the reasons for these deportations. I do ask about the timing, and must ask the plain question: why now? How long has the Home Office had the evidence on which the Home Secretary acted? Did it obtain it before, or after, the United States bombing of Libya?

On 1 May 1984, following the murder of Woman Police Constable Yvonne Fletcher, I asked the Home Secretary's predecessor about Libyans being trained by our armed forces, whose training was described by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces as being compatible with British defence interests. Since then, have further Libyans been admitted for training at Oxford airport flying school?

Two years ago I asked about 280 Libyan nationals being trained by British Airways and other airlines, most of them near Heathrow, and within close proximity to that airport, with all that that might imply. Two hundred and fifty are still being trained at Heathrow, Gatwick and other airports. The Government have said that they have issued guidelines about security risks. Is that all that they intend to do?

Was the Home Secretary consulted in advance about the internal security implications for this country of the decision to allow the use of British bases for the bombing of Libya? If so, did he say that it was in the British interest?

Is it not a fact that it can be easier for certain overseas nationals to enter Britain to commit acts of terrorism than for an Indian grandmother to enter Britain to attend a family wedding—[Interruption.] It is true.

After two years of complacency following the death of WPC Fletcher, why have the Government suddenly acted with such speed? Have they at last realised, following approaches from the Opposition two years old, that some potential terrorists are at large in this country? Or does it follow the outcry against the Prime Minister's collusion over the American bombing of Libya? Is this simply a cosmetic exercise to cover up the unacceptable face of Thatcherism?

Mr. Hurd: On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, the operation had to be timed exactly, as it involved 11 police forces. I was anxious that a short, factual statement should be made publicly as soon as we had received information that the first stage had been completed. I did not want there to be any misunderstanding, in Libya or elsewhere, even in the short term, about the purpose of the operation. I am ready to keep the House informed where the scale or sensitivity of the operation requires that.

Steps are being taken to ensure that pilots and engineers being trained in this country can do no harm either at the airports or in the aircraft. There are some legal and practical complications about further action, but the Departments concerned are reviewing the matter urgently.

Of course I was consulted, and I certainly support the Government's decision, which has frequently been defended and explained in the House. The right hon. Gentleman will know that the powers that I exercised in this case are serious ones, which are defined clearly in law. Student activity in support of a foreign Government need not in itself harm national security, which is the test. However, I judged that, following the threats last week, in this case there was a threat to national security. Therefore, the answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question is that I reviewed the position last week in the light of the latest information and decided that the criteria within which I must exercise my powers were met and that the presence of those 21 students in this country was no longer conducive to national security.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Did my right hon. Friend see the press reports last week suggesting that two of the Libyans arrested following demonstrations were in this country on visas which expired months ago? What check is made on such visas? If there is a genuine check, will my right hon. Friend ensure that such people do not stay in this country after their visas have expired?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I saw the report. The answer to my right hon. Friend's question is yes.

Mr. A J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Is the student who went on radio and offered to undertake a suicide mission among those to be deported? Why was he not deported earlier? Is willingness to take part in organised student activity the only relevant criterion, or will the Home Secretary consider others? Will he take special account of the position of those Libyans in this country who are opponents of Colonel Gaddafi and who would be at risk if they returned to Libya, and may even be at risk in this country?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is yes. The person concerned has not, for some time, been in a position to act in the way that the hon. Gentleman described. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's second question is also yes. I am aware that by no means all the Libyans in this country are friendly towards, or supporters of, Colonel Gaddafi.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Do aliens who have been served with notices of intention to deport have any right of appeal?

Mr. Hurd: My decision was taken in the interests of national security under section 15(3) of the Immigration Act 1971. As my hon. and learned Friend knows, in those circumstances there is no right of appeal to the immigration appellate authorities. Those concerned have a non-statutory right to make representations to a panel of three advisers, and they have been informed of that right. Some have already indicated that they do not wish to exercise it.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Can the Home Secretary advise us of the number of Libyan students resident in the United Kingdom? Further to the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), can the right hon. Gentleman tell us what substantial body of information about the harmful activities embarked upon by the 21 students was available post-14 April?

Mr. Hurd: About 1,800 Libyan students are in this country, but, as I have said, many of them must be reckoned as critics or opponents of the Gaddafi regime. The 21 to whom I have referred today are organisers of activity in support of the Gaddafi regime. Such activity is not in all circumstances harmful to national security. I reviewed the information about their organising activity after the events of last week and decided that the presence of these 21 people in this country in the present circumstances was no longer conducive to national security, so I took the action I have announced.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Why have only 21 Libyans been deported? Why not deport all Libyans now in this country, as that is what the vast majority of people in the country want?

Mr. Hurd: Because my powers are limited in the way I have said, and I have exercised these powers in the interests of national security. I shall not hesitate to exercise those powers again when it seems to me that the criteria that I have been describing are met.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is not the failure of the Government to do anything meaningful about the training of Libyan pilots and engineers supine and passive, and does that not therefore make the rest of the right hon. Gentleman's reply less than helpful and less than relevant?

Mr. Hurd: I have already answered that question. Steps have been taken to ensure that these people, whether the small number of pilots or the small number of engineers, can do no harm at the airports or in aircraft. We are considering further measures that will be necessary.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on this action. Is he looking equally closely at other nationals in this country whose Governments have been known to sponsor and support terrorism? In particular, if the evidence which has been reported is correct that Syrians might have been involved in the preparation of the bomb that nearly got to the El Al airliner, will he not flinch from taking equally robust action against Syrians, whether or not they have diplomatic immunity?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend will not expect me to comment on that particular example, but the general point that he makes is right. My concern has to be not just with Libyans but with any of those whose presence in this country is not condusive to the national security.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Is not the expulsion of 21 individuals a crude, blatant attempt to whip up anti-Libyan hysteria in the country, remembering that the Government are very unpopular, and is it not also an attempt to justify further attacks against civilians in Libya?

Mr. Hurd: No, this is a measured and considered response to the organising activity in this country of those particular 21 people.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): While welcoming my right hon. Friend's statement this afternoon and dissociating all Conservative Members from the pathetic utterances of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), may I ask my right hon. Friend whether these measures are not totally inadequate? In the late 1930s the appeasers had their way, and history will prove our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to be one of the most stalwart defenders of civilisation and freedom in the world.

Mr. Hurd: I have taken the measures that lie within my power and responsibility. Other measures have been taken. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said, in our view further measures are still needed by our partners and ourselves.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Does the Home Secretary agree that the vast majority of the British people will support strong, non-violent action against people when there is evidence to suggest that they are involved in any way in terrorism? Is this why the Government have taken this action? Does the right hon. Gentleman also agree that the British people overwhelmingly reject violent retaliation against civilians who have not been engaged in terrorism?

Mr. Hurd: I have a strong feeling that opinion is shifting on the latter point made by the hon. Gentleman. As the facts are more clearly deployed, there is a much better understanding than there was a few days ago of the strength of the arguments which led the Government to take the decision that they took.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): How large is the Libyan community in Britain, and have any limitations been placed on Libyans seeking entry?

Mr. Hurd: Of course there are limitations. That is why the remark of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was so mischievous. He knows that ever since the St. James's square disaster particular care has been taken to scrutinise the entry of Libyans, under arrangements which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) announced at the time. Those arrangements have been in force ever since. I am informed that there are about 7,000 Libyans in this country subject to immigration control.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Is the Home Secretary aware that a significant number of Libyans, who may not have been a security risk in this country last week, are likely to be a security risk now that the Government have authorised the bombing of their homes?

Mr. Hurd: I have to look at the situation from time to time to see whether the evidence available to me justifies the use of my powers. That is what I have recently done, and shall continue to do.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that for some years Libyans have been undergoing engineering training in my constituency. He will also be aware that during that time they have given no trouble and that the criteria he has used are acceptable to those Libyans as well as to my constituents. Anyone found acting against the best interests of this nation should be expelled under our rules. That also applies to those students now undergoing training in Perthshire.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Today is an Opposition day and we have already had an extension of Question Time. We must now move on.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall not take it if it is a continuation of the private notice question.

Mr. Faulds: No, it is not, Sir. Not at all. In the matter of priority of parliamentary consideration, how comes it that this private notice question on the deportation of Libyans was granted today, when the much more important matter of the use of British bases by the United States Government was not permitted on Monday, when the Foreign Office wished to make a statement but was overruled by No. 10? Why was that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know anything about that.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House I will put together the Questions on the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Value Added Tax (Land) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 704) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Value Added Tax (Land) (No. 2) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 716) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Cope.]

Police Complaints Procedure (Amendment)

3.47 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Police and Criminal Evidence Act to establish an entitlement for a complainant to have access to the report of the police on the substance of his or her complaint; and to make related provision.

I have sought the leave of the House to introduce this Bill because I wish to remove a justified criticism of the present procedure, which was introduced under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1985. I have not introduced it as an anti-police measure. Indeed, in my view it is just as important to the majority of police that complaints can be investigated thoroughly and correctly, and that that can not only be done but be seen to be done.

In any free and democratic society it is essential to ensure that an individual has the right to make a complaint against those charged with protecting the community and enforcing the law and order. The number of police who give rise to such complaints, and the number of incidents, when seen in their true perspective, represent probably only a very small percentage. However, that does not mean that we do not have a problem.

The public's confidence in the police, and in their right to make a complaint in the knowledge that it will be fairly investigated, will be strengthened by the Bill. At present, after completion of an investigation, the complainant is given virtually no information by which to determine whether that investigation was carried out fairly. The complainant is ultimately notified if the Director of Public Prosecutions recommends any action. If no prosecution is recommended or instituted, the assistant chief constable then determines what disciplinary action, if any, should be taken. Many complainants feel that the action taken is not sufficient. However, it may be quite reasonable if the report has not been done fairly or adequately and the action taken is based solely on it. After all, if the basis of the report is wrong, the action taken will also be wrong.

The Bill provides for a complainant to have access to the substance of the report arising from his or her complaint. I do not expect the full details of all investigations to be given. Such a suggestion could inhibit an inquiry. In many cases there would be a substantial amount of material, but the substance of the report should sastisfy those concerned that all the relevant items had been investigated in a full and correct way.

I accept the point which has been put to me in the past 24 hours, that the individual complained about should have a right to see the substance of the report. I do not dispute that those complained against also have rights. It is possible that on a few occasions an unfair or unjustified complaint has been made. The essential point that I am pursuing is that it is important to bring this issue into the open. Secrecy breeds suspicion and allows uncertainty to remain. The problem is not new. It must have existed in almost all civilised societies. There is an old Roman saying—I shall not attempt the Latin version:

"But who is to guard the guards themselves?"

I do not pretend that the measure will end all the criticisms of the present procedure. However, it will be a welcome improvement. It will assist Members of Parliament whose constituents raise this issue with them from time to time. Frequently, they hear only one side of the case. I recognise that, whatever the problem — whether it concerns housing or another subject — one hears only the favourable points and not the adverse factors which need to be taken into account.

I am dealing with two cases in my constituency arising from the police complaints procedure. Time does not permit me to go into the details. The point at issue is that neither complainant is satisfied with the outcome of his complaint and the resultant investigation or action. If the substance of the report were made available, the complainant would be able to see on what basis the decisions and actions had been taken, and I, too, could make such a judgment.

Both constituents feel that they have suffered an injustice and are not happy with the position. Because the investigations have been carried out by the police, albeit from another police force, my constituents do not feel that the investigations have been conducted fairly. They feel that all the points they have raised to support their cases may not have been taken into account and investigated fairly and fully. Without the substance of the report, the question must be unanswered.

When the police act unfairly or improperly, it is essential that an individual in a civilised society should be able to make a complaint, confident in the knowledge that it will be dealt with responsibly. I do not believe that such confidence exists. That is bad for the complainant, for the police and for society as a whole. The Bill will help to remove these doubts and will be an important step in strengthening and improving our present procedure. It is important that we take this step. This modest and sensible proposal will improve the position. On that basis, I hope that it will receive the support which it deserves.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Jack Straw, Mr. Tony Lloyd, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Sean Hughes, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Allan Roberts, Mr. Gerald Bermingham and Mr. Richard Caborn.

Police Complaints Procedure (Amendment)

Mr. Peter Pike accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Police and Criminal Evidence Act to establish an entitlement for a complainant to have access to the report of the police on the substance of his or her complaint; and to make related provision: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 April and to be printed. [Bill 138.]

Statements and Private Notice Questions

3.55 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for raising this point of order, but it relates to the principle of a private notice question versus a statement from a Minister and is directly within your responsibility.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that Ministers have now become aware of the fact that on a private notice question you quite rightly limit the time for questions from those other than the right hon. or hon. Gentleman asking the question. For example, today you gave 15 minutes of the House's valuable time for the private notice question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

In my view, the issue is so important that the Home Secretary should have made a statement. There is no question in my mind but that you would have given more time to question the Home Secretary had he made a statement rather than having to respond to a private notice question from my right hon. Friend. The point is that you ought to consider the amount of time that you allow for supplementary questions to a private notice question.

There is now no doubt that at this time of crisis in relation to Libya, America and Great Britain, Ministers are seeking to wriggle out of their responsibilities to the House. Today, the Home Secretary should have made a statement. Because he did not, and because you were placed in such a position, other right hon. and hon. Members who wanted to ask questions were, through no fault of yours, denied the opportunity to do so. In those circumstances, you ought to consider extending the time on a private notice question if the issue is of sufficient importance to warrant a statement from the Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point is that the Government did not make a statement and I granted the private notice question. A private notice question is an extension of Question Time. The whole House knows that I have a high regard for the time given to Back Benchers. It is precisely because there is such a long list of Back Benchers wishing to speak on the two Opposition motions that I gave only 15 minutes for the private notice question.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It only wastes time.

Mr. Dalyell: It will illuminate the problem. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) very properly asked the Home Secretary whether he was consulted in advance. The Home Secretary——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The private notice question is an extension of Question Time. I cannot deal with that. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question on a matter for which I am responsible. I am not really responsible for anything like that.

Mr. Dalyell: Your responsibility is to provide clarification. Unless you give time, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to clarify from the Home Secretary's answers whether he knew in advance. It is important to give time so that the Home Secretary's answers can be clarified, so that we know what he really meant and whether he knew about the attack on Libya in advance, or was consulted afterwards. That is why my right hon. Friend raised a substantial issue.

Mr. Speaker: The House knows that I have an exceedingly difficult job balancing what is important and what is even more important. The two Opposition motions today are very important, and I had to make that judgment.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should be grateful if you would consider the genuine and important points of order that my hon. Friends have raised, in the light of a decision that you made a few weeks ago, which I thought was very helpful to the House. You will recall that on that occasion, following a point of order that I raised, a Minister then rose on a point of order and made what you turned into a statement because you said that it was an abuse of a point of order.

The point that my hon. Friends are making is that when a Minister is using the device of a private notice question to evade giving a full statement, you might consider turning that into a statement, with the consequences for questioning that would ensue from that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The trouble is that I do not have that power. It is a matter for the Government whether they make a statement.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that we have had enough of this.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I understand that, Mr. Speaker. However——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Then why is the hon. Gentleman trying to raise a point of order?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My point of order arises on an additional point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to deal with the first point of order. I must balance these matters. Many hon. Members, including a maiden speaker, wish to take part in the debate that follows. I gave an extension of 15 minutes on Question Time today, and that was a good run for a private notice question.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My point relates to the same issue, Mr. Speaker, but approaches it from a different angle. I believe that the point is very important. Is the only distinction between a private notice question and a ministerial statement that a Minister has decided that the matter warrants precedence over other business, whereas you decide that for a private notice question? To some extent, therefore, they surely have the same status. If they have the same status, there must be times and occasions when you might wish to ensure that they are given equal time in relation to procedure in debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. There are times and occasions when I do that, and I have done that today.

Opposition Day

[12TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Housing

4.1 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I beg to move,

That this House calls for a new approach to housing policy which combines investment in good housing with responses to family and individual needs reflecting the informed opinions of tenants and home buyers, in order to bring about solutions based upon choice, freedom and fairness, to improve the quality of life throughout the whole community.

Mr. Speaker: I should announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Rooker: In the Queen's Speech last November the Prime Minister said:

"Labour could not hold a candle to our record on housing."
—[Official Report, 6 November 1985; Vol. 86, c. 19.]

The Government amendment to the Opposition motion today appears to reflect that view, although I notice that the name of the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction does not appear on it. It is therefore important to set out some of the old problems as a result of the Tory record to see why new solutions are required.

Our housing is old and deteriorating. One in four homes in England pre-date the first world war. I must add that those homes are not the only homes that are deteriorating. Britain spends less of its wealth on housing than any of the 11 Common Market countries and is behind the United States, Sweden, Norway and Finland in that respect. Indeed, we are at Third world levels in relation to the wealth we spend on housing.

The period of this Government has seen the national house-building programme plummet from an average of 285,000 new homes a year under the previous Labour Government to only 180,000 a year for the first five years of the Conservative Government. That is a drop, as I have said repeatedly, of 2,000 new homes every week since the Conservatives came to power in 1979.

So far, the best year that the Conservatives have managed was 1983 when 217,000 new homes were started nationally. Unfortunately it seems to have escaped the Prime Minister's attention that her best year of home starts is 47,000 new homes below the 1978 figure which was the worst year for new home starts under the previous Labour Government. That shows above all else that the Prime Minister's claim in the debate on the Queen's Speech in November is quite preposterous.

All of us know that the Government generated a pre-election boom in home improvement grants. However, once the election was over the chopper came down quite firmly. The number of home improvement grants in 1985 is less than half of the 1984 total. The Government's Green Paper "Home improvements — a new approach", effectively spells the end of home improvement grants as a policy instrument for raising the standard of an area. Even those living in decent housing—this point escapes Ministers — need to know and be sure that their neighbours' homes will be looked after, if only for the narrow interest of preserving the value of their own homes.

The Government Green Paper, to all appearances, is finished. We have hardly heard a pip from the Government because of the overwhelming response against the proposals contained in that Green Paper.

The Government must be constantly reminded that, in the rush of pre-election time-limited bonanza, extra staff throughout the country had to be taken on by local authorities. Because of the cuts, tens of thousands of our fellow citizens who applied for grants during that time, will never receive them unless there is a substantial and vast change in Government policy. People are extremely bitter. How can they now be blamed for being reluctant to spend money on their homes when a programme of improvement might resume rendering them ineligible for the grant that they might otherwise have received.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: I will give way later as I wish to make progress now.

On top of that failure, the demolition rates have also been cut. The building figures of new homes are down nationally and demolition levels are also down. It therefore follows that it is crucial that improvements are vastly stepped up. We do not need lectures from the Government, as the Labour party first introduced the system of home improvement grants for private sector home-owners.

To add to the crisis, there is also an increase in households beyond the increase in population. The Government are aware that many "hidden" homeless people are forced to share other people's homes. The legally defined homeless figure rises each year the Government are in office. In 1985 it topped 90,000. I do not see how the Government amendment fixes figures in relation to the 90,000-plus homeless families in 1985. Those people are not homeless out of choice. Their freedom is severely limited and they do not believe that the system is fair.

Is it Tory freedom and fairness which has caused an estimated 14,000 families to be in bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Are Conservative Members satisfied with the quality of life that they mention in the amendment for the estimated 750,000 handicapped people living in housing that is not suited to their needs? To add further to the crisis on the Tory record, it is known that long-stay patients in psychiatric hospitals are mainly long-stay because there is no alternative accommodation. In the face of that, how can the Government, through their manipulation of the Opposition motion, say that there is choice, freedom and fairness?

I stress two further points to highlight the Tory record on housing—the record which the Prime Minister said that the Opposition could not hold a candle to. After six years of Conservative Government—the figures relate to April 1985 — no fewer than 4 million out of the 18 million homes in England were either unfit for human habitation, lacking in basic amenities such as an inside toilet or hot and cold running water, or were in need of substantial renovation.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: I must continue.

That figure of 4 million represents 20 to 25 per cent. of the homes in England. That is some record and certainly shows that there is not much fairness. I give way to the first hon. Gentleman who wished to intervene.

Mr. Latham: I notice that when the hon. Gentleman was giving the figures for new housing starts, he compared the Labour party record with the Government's record. He did not give the same comparison for improvement grants. Will he do that now?

Mr. Rooker: I shall be quite happy to recount the figures. However, my point is that the Opposition's housebuilding record, as I have said, was 2,000 new starts every week better than the Government's. We were demolishing old and decrepit housing faster than the Tory Government. It naturally follows that, if we are to maintain housing standards, there must be a vast increase in improvement grants. No one can deny that, because of the pre-election boom, the Tories engineered a boom in home improvement grants to hide the cuts in new housebuilding and the further cuts in demolition. There is no denying that. That is not part of my case, but the record overall is not one of which the Government can be proud.

Mr. Rooker: There is also the Tory record on rents and mortgage interest. Even with the recent decreases in the latter, mortgage interest has on average been 50 per cent. higher under the Tory Government than it was under Labour.

I want to be fair to the Government. I am in favour of being fair and placing the facts on the record. The increase in the retail price index between 1979 and 1985—in the first six years of the present Government—was 74·6 per cent. At the same time, rents went up by 144 per cent., and the index for mortgage interest rose by 158 per cent. That is the scale of the increase in mortgage interest compared with inflation under the Tories. Ministers may not agree with the figures, but it was provided by the Library and confirmed by a Minister in a parliamentary answer on 28 January.

Despite those figures, the Government have the brass face to tell us that we cannot hold a candle to their record on housing. Despite that appalling catalogue, the Government are arrogant enough to claim in their amendment that they are fulfilling the housing aspirations of the British people.

Mr. Marlow: There are two aspects to the provision of housing. One is national Government and the other is the local authority. The hon. Gentleman says that a great number of houses are sadly below standard. What proportion of those houses is in Labour local authority areas? Will he also explain why, although Lambeth has much higher rates than Wandsworth, the housing situation is much worse in Lambeth than in Wandsworth, a Conservative local authority with a lower rate? What is the secret? What is the difference? Why does that happen?

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) always asks about Lambeth, to which he is, of course, extremely grateful for his home improvement grant.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Rooker: No, I shall not give way again. I did not say that the hon. Gentleman criticised Lambeth—he did that himself. I said that he is eternally grateful to Lambeth.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Rooker: Many of my hon. Friends——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman sure that it is not a point of frustration?

Mr. Marlow: I am not a net debtor to Lambeth.

Mr. Rooker: Millions of home owners and tenants are demanding a change of policy. What we do not save in our housing stock we shall lose. The next generation will have to foot the bill.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman answer the question?

Mr. Rooker: There is no one answer. No one in his right mind would claim that there is one answer. None of my hon. Friends would claim that there is, and I am sure that the Minister would not either. However, a start must be made. The Government could make a start by redressing some of their own faults. They could, for example, lift VAT from improvements and repairs carried out by registered builders. The money lost in VAT would be saved out of the black economy. The Government made a fantastic and fundamental error in 1984 in imposing VAT. The imposition has caused considerable difficulties. Lifting the burden of VAT from improvements and repairs by registered builders would pay for itself.

A programme should be pledged to ensure that within two to three years at the most every home in the land has hot and cold water, a bath and an inside toilet. That is a very modest proposal, but each of those basic amenities is lacking in at least half a million homes.

The labour and materials are there, and, heaven knows the need is there. The investment would be a prudent one, and putting decent amenities into our houses would save the NHS a fortune.

The Government must scrap the Green Paper on home improvements. We need proposals that would not penalise home-owners as the proposals in the Green Paper seem to do. Private money could be encouraged into improvement work through public channels. That has been advocated by some Labour-controlled local authorities.

Grant procedures must be simplified to encourage those who are bewildered by the form-filling that is needed if they are to take up the opportunities. With the present lack of either newbuild or demolition, the take-up of grants needs to be positively encouraged rather than cut again as it was in 1985.

On no occasion have the Government increased the financial limits of the grants or the cheap scheme for the first-time buyers which they inherited from the Labour Government. They should do so immediately.

We need a national programme for the repair and modernisation of our 5 million or 6 million council dwellings. The Government should set it up in a way that actively involves the tenants. The Government know the scale of the problem. It is not fanciful to say that there is a demand for repair and modernisation. The Government's own report of last November on the condition of public sector housing stock itemised one area of stock after another — flats and houses categorised by age — and arrived at the need to spend £18 billion on bringing that stock up to good condition. A start should be made on a national programme actively involving tenants.

We must go further. It is crucial that tenants and home owners should have new rights to be involved in the modernisation, repair and improvement of their homes. Another of our modest proposals is that there should be a right to demand that the work is done satisfactorily before payment is made for repairs or improvement. That vital right does not exist today for local authority tenants or for home owners on the receiving end of improvement grants. They have no right to insist that the work be done to their satisfaction before the local authority can pay the builder or the contractor.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Or the direct labour organisations.

Mr. Rooker: Yes, or the DLOs. People will not feel responsible for caring for the improved properties unless they are involved.

Some Conservative Members have joined us in another demand that we have made on three or four occasions in the past year. The money locked up in local authority bank accounts, being the proceeds of the sale of property or land, must be released. To ignore £6 billion is simply not prudent financial management. I am sure that all the Ministers at the Department of the Environment agree. However, they cannot say so, because the Treasury will not permit them to do so.

We need an immediate increase in resources devoted to the Housing Corporation, in order to enable the voluntary sector of housing authorities and co-operatives to flourish and to contribute in the area in which it can contribute so much—catering for the special needs of the young and the elderly. In addition, the voluntary sector should once again be able to concentrate on what it can do extremely well — rehabilitating rundown housing for family purposes.

I make a plea on behalf of the Opposition generally and of some Labour Members in particular who have defective housing in their constituencies.

The House must seriously consider the problems of defective housing and put muscle behind the Housing Defects Act 1984 which had all-party support. However, there must be the proviso that resources will be made available to make the Act a reality. If that is not done the House will be conning hundreds of people.

We must not throw good money after bad—nobody is asking for that. However, hundreds of thousands of families who live in defective housing — owners and tenants — need to know where they stand. They are in homes which they cannot sell and for which there is a block on improvement grants and modernisation by public sector landlords. It is crucial that we take action.

Without returning to the quick-build policies of the 1950s and 1960s — I have had to use statistics as a qualification of the scale of the damage, but we are not interested in playing the numbers game for the sake of building junk housing—which caused so much distress to people trapped in high-rise blocks and walk up deck-access flats, we must have a national comprehensive building programme for all kinds of tenure. That includes those who wish to rent, those who wish to buy and those who wish to do a bit of both through shared ownership.

Mr. Maples: The hon. Gentleman has referred to those who wish to buy, and the motion refers to choice. I am sure that he will agree that most people, given the choice, would prefer to own their homes. Can the hon. Gentleman explain how such aspirations would be realised by the 6 million public sector tenants if a future Labour Government stopped the sale of council houses?

Mr. Rooker: A future Labour Government would not remove the right to buy—we have made that absolutely clear. It is no good the hon. Member looking surprised, for it is there, chapter and verse, in "Homes for the Future".

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): It is called a U-turn.

Mr. Rooker: It is not a U-turn. Let me give an example to prove that. In 1967 the Labour Government gave home owners of leasehold houses the right to buy the freehold, and that was without Conservative party support. Recently, the Tory Government went to the European Court to defend that piece of socially just legislation. We do not deny that we opposed the Government's proposals in the Housing Act 1980. But although our proposals are not the same as the Government's, because we want to replace what has been sold, we now accept each other's position. There is no argument about that and there is no point in the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) refering to a U-turn.

We accept people's right to buy, in the same way as the Tories opposed the right for home owners to buy their freeholds which had been granted under the Labour Government. No Labour Government have ever stopped a council—whether Tory or Labour controlled—from selling houses to its tenants.

Mr. Maples rose——

Mr. Rooker: No, I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Maples rose——

Mr. Rooker: No. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to make his own speech later. I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is my hon. Friend aware that, over a quarter of a century ago the Labour-controlled council of Coventry was building houses for sale?

Mr. Rooker: The record of Labour-controlled local authorities providing homes for sale, up and down the country, is clear. If the Government half close the gap between their average levels of house building and that of the last Labour Government it would mean an extra 50,000 new homes a year. Our target is simple and we have made it clear. We will build and plan to repair and improve at a rate faster than the present rate of housing decay. The problem of house decay is serious and, if we do not meet it, future generations will have problems with which they will be unable to cope.

Poor housing is an injustice for all our community, but those who live in it live out the injustice on a daily basis. An investment in housing is an investment in people both in their homes and in their jobs. We cannot offer real choice, freedom and the fairness inherent in decent housing unless the nation wakes up and starts to put people first. That is our intention.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the Government's approach to housing policy which combines investment in good housing with responses to family and individual needs reflecting the informed opinions of tenants and home buyers, in order to bring about solutions based upon choice, freedom and fairness; and congratulates the Government on its achievements since 1979 in fulfilling housing aspirations and improving the quality of life throughout the whole community.'.

The amendment recognises the crucial truth about the debate. Phrase like "putting people first" or "choice, freedom and fairness" may be new themes to the Labour party, but they are not new themes for the Conservative party. They have been the basis of our housing policy for the past seven years, since the introduction of the tenant's charter and the Housing Act 1980.

It is right that I should welcome the Labour party's conversion to the importance of choice, freedom and fairness, but it has been some time coming. The Labour party's attitude to the introduction of the right-to-buy policy followed different priorities from those outlined by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) when he discussed the policy in his speech.

When the Labour party was faced with one of the most popular housing policies introduced by any Government, what did it do? It opposed it. It did not put people first, it put the wishes of local authorities first. Even now, when the overwhelming popularity of the right-to-buy policy has forced the Labour party to accept it, it has done so grudgingly.

Mr. Robert Atkins: A U-turn.

Mr. John Patten: It has done a sort of U-turn, but more of that in a moment.

From the policy paper "Homes for the Future", to which my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) referred in his telling intervention, and which the Labour party conference approved six months ago, it is far from clear whether it has accepted the right-to-buy policy. I demonstrate that by quoting from the document which tells us that the right to buy

"has the effects of restricting choice for tenants".

With regard to the public sector stock, it says that the right to buy

"has only made matters worse".

Which is the real Labour party policy? That approved by the Labour party conference, or that skated over by the hon. Member for Perry Barr?

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle) rose——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Rooker rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way in a moment. I did not interrupt the speech of the hon. Member for Perry Barr.

In that document, the Labour party proposed to allow local authorities to "determine whether, in the light of all the circumstances, council tenants should be able to buy their houses".

That is not so much a conversion as a case of half falling off the donkey on the road to Damascus—a mixture of "Me-tooism" and totally muddled Labour party policy formulation.

Mr. Allan Roberts rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way with pleasure to the hon. Gentleman later. The U-turn referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) shows how much the ground has been shifted—it is ground not of Conservative party choosing but of the choosing of British people.

Mr. Allan Roberts rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall give way in a moment as I promised.

Mr. Peter Riddell revealed yesterday in the Financial Times that Labour's own research had revealed that the party was "in danger of being seen as rooted in the 1960s and the 1970s in its approach".

The hon. Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and for Perry Barr are trying to drag the party into the 1980s. They have some way to go yet. But how much will it all cost?

This morning a new document on housing was launched. It is a glossy new document published in the new, fashionable soft-focus colouring, blurred round the edges, such as we are accustomed to seeing in some newspapers. It refers to a new package of housing policies. But how much will it cost? My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is waiting, with his little calculator, for evidence of how much it will cost so that he can add it to the £24 billion of pledges that the Labour party has already given.

I shall give way to the hon. Member for Perry Barr if he will tell me the cost. The hon. Member for Copeland is also sitting on the Opposition Front Bench. I shall gladly give way to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Perry Barr if they will tell me the cost of their programme. It appears either that they do not know the cost of their programme, or that if they do know how much it would cost they are refusing to tell the House.

Mr. Rooker: What is the cost of the 4 million people who are living in decaying and unfit housing? What is the cost of the people who are living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation? What is the cost of the 90,000 people who are homeless every year, and of the 4 million people in the dole queue who are being wasted?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman should be ashamed of himself. One does not answer one question by asking five or six others. If the hon. Gentleman cannot give a straight answer to a straight question, let the hon. Member for Copeland, who is in charge of the Labour party's policy on the environment, get up and tell us the cost. If he will not do so, either he does not know or he is trying to perpetrate a fraud on the electorate by putting forward an uncosted and false prospectus.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: If the Opposition Front Bench will not tell us the cost, perhaps the hon. Member for Bootle will tell us what it is.

Mr. Roberts: I shall say something about the cost of housing investment later, Mr. Speaker, if I catch your eye. As for U-turns and public expenditure on housebuilding, one of the Government's main arguments during the proceedings in Committee, of which I was a member, on the Housing Bill of 1980, in favour of the sale of council houses was that one could use the capital receipts from the sale of council houses to replace those that had been sold. Why have the Government done a U-turn? Why will the Government not allow local authorities to spend their capital receipts on the building of houses? Has the Minister read the Labour party's document "Homes for the Future"? Is he in favour of the Labour party's commitment to replace every house that is sold by building a new one?

Mr. Patten: We are, of course——

Mr. Roberts: Answer.

Mr. Patten: That is exactly what I am going to do. The hon. Gentleman should restrain himself. He asked a direct question. The answer is that each year we are permitting a proportion of the accumulated sums of money from council house sales to be spent on new building. Not all the £6 billion is now backed by cash. Much of the £6 billion has now been spent on other purposes, so not all of it is available. We are reviewing the capital control system. We have had this argument across the Floor of the House on a number of occasions since I became Minister for Housing. A new series of questions now has to be asked about the cost of the Labour party's programme. The Opposition Front Bench refuses to give that information because it does not have it. Therefore, I give due notice that I shall return to the issue again and again.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): Did my hon. Friend hear correctly the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), who said that it was the Labour party's policy to replace every council house that is sold with another council house? Will he speculate on the cost to the Exchequer and the financial institutions of this country of replacing about 900,000 council houses?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend has put his finger on the confusion in the Labour party's policy. I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Perry Barr. He said that he did not want to play the numbers game. He also said that there was a pressing need to build more and more houses. I invited him to give the answer, but he has not chosen to explain how that programme will be paid for.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: I shall give way later to the hon. Gentleman. I am conscious of the fact that during our last debate I was unable to give way to him.

It is as difficult as ever to tell what is the official policy of the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party on this issue, as expressed in their amendment on the Order Paper which has not been selected for debate. The Social Democratic party seems to accept the right to buy. That leaves the Liberal party, as I am always being reminded by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, in the extraordinary position of being the only party that does not officially accept the right to buy. The amendment of the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party does not suggest that they are about to resolve this confusion. If my right hon. and hon. Friends have not read the amendment, I recommend them to read it. It reads like a John Cleese parody of the risible results of consensus policy making.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Before the Minister leaves that point, will he give way?

Mr. Patten: Perhaps I shall get a straight answer from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Alton: The answer is unequivocally yes, the Liberal party would retain the right to buy. The amendment specifically says that it would.

Mr. Patten: If that is now official Liberal party policy, it is extremely useful information to have from the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr ended on the question of the right to buy and home ownership, and naturally, I began on those issues in order to take up his points. The right to buy has been successful because it recognises the wish of the great majority of the British people to own their own homes.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Patten: Mortgage famines have disappeared and mortgage rates are coming down. Mortgage rates are being significantly reduced, for the second time in a matter of weeks.

Mr. Banks: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: Before I turn to the rented sector, I shall of course give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Banks: On the Minister's point about the right to buy in the private sector, according to the most recent survey in the London borough of Newham, only 7 per cent. of the population can afford to buy a house that costs about £35,000, which is a low price in the south-east. Is the Minister aware that because of the massive unemployment and other poverty that has been brought about in Newham by this Government's policies, the right to buy in the private sector is effectively denied to the people of Newham?

Mr. Patten: In the Housing and Planning Bill we are trying to include additional incentives for flat dwellers, a substantial number of whom live in the London borough of Newham, which will make it more possible for them to buy their homes. I do not want to devote the burden of my speech to the right to buy, but I had to deal with the points that were made by the hon. Member for Perry Barr.

More choice, freedom and fairness are needed in the rented sector. I have made that point time and again since I have been Minister for Housing. I hope that the hon. Member for Perry Barr recognises that fact. The right to buy and home ownership have not been the only tunes that I have played either in debates in this House or in Standing Committee. That is one of the best ways to avoid the mistakes of the past.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr referred to choice and fairness. Council tenants did not have much choice about the design of the estates and tower blocks that were built in the 1960s and 1970s. Alas, those designs reflected what the bureaucrats and architects in central Government and local government thought was best. The people were not consulted. All those who were involved made that fundamental mistake. The result has been many of the housing problems that face us today. We are trying to deal with the failed solutions to past problems, and we are now in the third or fourth cycle of trying to solve them. I very much regret that the management record of many local authorities has not made solving those problems any easier.

I have said it before, but it has to be said again, that just as there are far too many homes standing empty in the private sector, so there are 116,000 houses and flats standing empty in the public sector. That is more than the total number of people who are accepted in this country as being homeless. In fact, 26,000 houses and flats have been standing empty for more than 12 months. Those houses and flats are an affront to the homeless of this country.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: No. I have given way on many occasions, and in the interests of those right hon. and hon. Members who are hoping to speak I must make progress with my speech.

We hear a great deal from Labour-controlled local authorities, in particular, about the need for more expenditure, but rent arrears now total more than £200 million. In the worst 20 authorities alone, rent arrears equal about £94 million.

Labour authorities should tell us what they have been doing with the substantial sums of money spent on their stock. If their housing is in poor repair, how did they allow it to get into that state? What have they been doing for the past 30 or 40 years? Sheffield, for example, has been under Labour control for all but two of the last 40 years, and in the last six years alone it has spent £180 million on housing. Wolverhampton has been Labour for 30 years since the war, and in the last six years it has spent £115 million. Manchester has also enjoyed Labour control for most of the last 30 years, and it has spent £340 million on housing in the last six years.

What have these authorities been doing for so long with so much money? What has been the result? On the most recent figures available to me, Sheffield has nearly 3,000 empty homes. It is owed nearly £10 million in rent arrears — 15 per cent. of its annual rent income. Wolverhampton has nearly 2,000 empty homes—5 per cent. of its total stock—and rent arrears are nearly £3 million. Manchester has 6 per cent. of its stock standing empty—nearly 5,000 houses and flats. It is owed £4·5 million in rent arrears. What a record of the results of more than a generation of Labour control in those areas of housing. What a tribute to generations of Labour control. What an affront to the homeless.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), who I understand will wind up the debate for the Opposition and to whose speech I look forward, will find time to comment on Lambeth's record of 1,800 empty council houses and over £9 million in rent arrears—25 per cent. of its annual rent income.

The records of many of these councils are very poor, but they cannot be held entirely to blame. Many council housing departments are simply too big to manage properly, as I think all hon. Members recognise. I know that I have the agreement of the hon. Member for Perry Barr, because he quoted some telling figures in his speech on Second Reading of the Housing and Planning Bill. He told us that seven councils have more than 50,000 houses and flats to manage, and that a further 52 councils have between 20,000 and 50,000. The hon. Gentleman was certainly not exaggerating when he said that there was scope in that size of management for the bungling depersonalised approach. He was right and I commend his courage in saying it.

We have to find ways to break up these great empires and to achieve more diversity of management and ownership. I believe that there is a growing consensus in the House that those are desirable ends, even if we might not necessarily be able to agree on all the ways of achieving them. We have to encourage more tenant participation in the organisation and management of the blocks of flats, houses and estates in which they live. The Housing and Planning Bill will promote just this kind of change, and I welcome the enlightened attitude of Opposition spokesmen of all political parties in the Committee on that Bill to these new attempts to help tenants of housing in council ownership.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend mentioned parts of the record of Manchester. Probably, like me, he has received a letter from a Mr. Taylor of the city of Manchester, who has been seeking to misrepresent the Housing and Planning Bill. He is not only doing that, but is threatening to set up a conference for the purpose of inviting trade unionists and other councils further to misrepresent the Bill. Can my hon. Friend say what action the Government will take to prevent Manchester from putting politics rather than people first?

Mr. Patten: I am afraid that that letter has not come through to me. Perhaps my civil servants thought that I was too weak a spirit to receive such a threat from Manchester and decided to keep it off my desk. I deplore the way in which local councils, such as Manchester, or indeed Leicester, from time to time threaten people wishing to purchase their own homes that they will diversify management of tenure in the estates on which they live.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): What message does my hon. Friend have for those constituents of mine in Leicester, East who have been trying for the last three years to buy their own flats and have been prevented because the Labour party is denying them the right to do so? Those people are desperately keen to buy their own homes, but the Leicester city council, which is Labour-controlled at the moment, is refusing to allow them to do so. They want to be property owners, and they are being denied that right. What can we do in the Housing and Planning Bill to help them?

Mr. Patten: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has observed sotto voce, that is the authentic face of the Labour party at grass-roots level. What is going on in Leicester shows the yawning gulf between practice in so many Labour authorities in this land, alas, and the sensible, pragmatic and non-ideological words which come so often from Labour Front-Bench spokesmen. If my hon. Friend would like to write to me with examples of these shocking incidents, I shall look into them and see whether there is anything that I can do.

Local estate-based management is one of the key changes which my Department is advocating to local authorities through our priority estates project and the urban housing renewal unit.

Another matter that has been of great concern in recent debates on the Housing and Planning Bill is the need to bring in private investment. I must say to the hon. Member for Perry Barr that the misrepresentation by at least some parts of the Labour party of the intent of that Bill and the stories being put around in Labour party leaflets in places such as Wandsworth—I was shown a shocking example today—that the purpose of the Bill is to make it possible for tenants to be removed at will, freely and at the stroke of a pen, is wrong. The hon. Gentleman knows that. We are to have a chance to debate it on Report on Thursday. I simply want to put him on notice now that I shall do all that I possibly can to make sure that the truth is told about these proposals.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State hopes to say more about these initiatives when he replies to the debate. I should like to say how pleased we have been by the positive response that we have had from so many local authorities, many Labour authorities among them, to the offer of help by the urban housing renewal unit. More than 100 authorities have already asked for help from the UHRU and many schemes are being worked up. These authorities have realised that they do not themselves have all the answers, so they are prepared to work in partnership with central Government and with the private sector to try to provide some of the answers.

We have to look at new ways of providing rented housing. That is a theme to which we have to return in the House. The private sector certainly has a part to play, as do housing associations and other forms of investment institutions. This is critically important. These alternatives can not only offer tenants the prospect of better management, but can offer more choice, more freedom and more fairness compared with the hopelessly divided forms of housing that we have, with owner-occupation, council renting and precious little in between. This is one of the great blots on the social landscape of this country and is unique in the Western world. We have to do something to break down those barriers.

We need to spend money, too, on improving and repairing the stock. We were given the uncosted benefit of the uncosted thoughts of the hon. Member for Perry Barr and his uncharacteristically demure and self-effacing colleague the hon. Member for Copeland, who said what they were going to do, but not how they were going to pay for it, and when.

We have been spending money. We have spent a record amount on home improvements since 1979. We have spent more than £3 billion, and approximately £0·5 billion is being spent this year. It is the same in the public sector, where about £2·5 billion is being spent from the capital account and the revenue account on housing repairs and renovations—not before time. In 1978-79, the last year of the Labour Government, only £1 billion was spent. We have increased the amount of money spent on council house repairs and renovations by some 14 per cent. since 1979.

Let there be no tales from the Opposition about the Government not wishing to begin the substantial task of trying to bring back into good repair our housing stock and to undo many of the mistakes so tragically made in the last 20 or 30 years. Those are the areas in which expenditure is needed. It is not needed to play the numbers game or to provide vast new housing estates on which so much was spent in the '60s and '70s, to such disastrous effect.

Those are our priorities. We want to help those who wish to buy their own homes. We want to improve and diversify management for tenants, and we want to devote more resources to bringing back into use, by improvement and repair, houses for everyone, especially the homeless. Those are the priorities that really mean putting people first.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): I am pleased to have the opportunity to make my first speech in the House on this subject. I say that for three reasons. First, I have worked in housing for the last 14 years, a major part of which was with the housing organisation SHAC. Secondly, housing has, sadly, been neglected far too much in recent years and has been given far too low a priority, both in terms of public expenditure and emphasis by the Government. Thirdly, the Government's policy on housing is so woefully lacking that there is a crying need for a new approach and a new policy to try to ensure that many of our fellow citizens who have to endure shameful conditions of poverty and squalor and homelessness have the prospect of a decent home.

There is no doubt about the extent of the housing crisis. We know from the official figures that on the most cautious estimate something of the order of one in 10 properties are totally unsatisfactory — unfit for human habitation or suffering from a lack of basic amenities such as bathrooms and WCs, or requiring considerable expenditure to tackle disrepair. There is a huge backlog of properties in bad condition. They are to be found in the private rented sector, especially in constituencies such as mine.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to pay tribute to the two hon. Members who represented Fulham in the last 40 years — Michael Stewart, now Lord Stewart of Fulham in another place, and the late Martin Stevens whose unfortunate death led to the by-election which resulted in my election to this House. In my constituency a substantial number of properties are privately rented and many of the people who live in them have to endure appalling conditions. I was able to show those conditions to my hon. Friends the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Bar (Mr. Rooker) when they visited Fulham a couple of months ago. They saw some of the worst conditions anywhere in Britain.

Apart from privately rented housing, many owner-occupiers live in properties that they do not have the money to maintain. They are living in houses that are literally falling to bits around them, and action is needed to tackle that problem if we are not to see a much greater problem of deterioration in owner-occupied houses. As we all know, there is a huge backlog of poor condition council properties. Many of those houses were built to prefabricated systems that have proved unsatisfactory. Those systems were often encouraged by central Government and local authorities are now being given the blame for them because they followed the advice of central Government 20 or more years ago.

There is also a serious problem of unmet housing needs. We know from surveys carried out by organisations such as Shelter that 1·25 million households are registered on council waiting lists. That is a rather imperfect measure of need, but it shows the extent of the problem. Perhaps more graphic are the shameful figures of homelessness, of which the most recent for last year were published last week. They show that 94,000 households were accepted last year by local authorities in England as homeless. That is the highest number ever recorded and an increase of some 13 per cent. on the previous year. That is a measure of unmet needs.

The problems of poor conditions and unmet housing needs have been greatly exacerbated by Government cuts in housing expenditure. I should like to put a couple of figures on the record. The Minister said a great deal about the Government's spending record, but for every £100 spent on housing in the last year of the last Labour Government, only £30 was spent by this Government last year. That is a measure of the extreme cuts in expenditure on housing for which this Government have been responsible. We spend less as a proportion of our gross domestic product on housing than any other European country. We spend less than West Germany and less than Greece. We are at the bottom of the European league for spending on residential accommodation. The figures for public sector house building are a disgrace. Ten years ago 170,000 new homes were started. Last year, the figure was just 33,000 one fifth of the level achieved 10 years ago. That is the record of this Government.

The Minister talked about the polarisation between owner-occupation and council renting and said he wanted something in the middle. Many of us want that. Many of us, including myself, have served on committees of housing associations that have been striving to provide alternative tenures. For every three homes that housing associations were providing in 1979, the last year of the Labour Government, only one is being provided now, and that is because of cuts by the Government in expenditure on housing associations. That shows the hollowness of the Minister's claim that he is seeking some additional tenure through that medium. Some £20 billion is required to meet the backlog of poor condition in the council sector, but the current allocations go only a small way towards meeting that need.

Home improvement grants have been mentioned and I should like to put some more figures on the record. The Government's policy on home improvement grants has been a classic example of stop-go-go when they seek to inflate the economy or to give an impression of activity, and stop when the Treasury says no. Last year, the number of home improvement grants approved was some 137,000, a 40 per cent. cut on the number a year before of 229,000. Is that the way to plan for the future? Is that the way to give confidence to people who want to improve their homes? Is that the way to run any public administration? The answer to those questions is no, it is a disgraceful way to proceed.

Government policy does not involve only cuts because it is also one-sided. The Government are obsessed with the owner-occupied market and in assisting the extension of owner-occupation. They ignore the needs of those people who either cannot afford or do not want to own their own homes. The right to buy has frequently been mentioned, but the chief criticism of the right to buy in the Government's own Housing Act 1980 is that it provides a benefit to those council tenants who could and want to buy, and totally neglects the needs of the homeless, the badly housed and council tenants who want to transfer to other accommodation. It is a one-sided policy that neglected the needs of an important section of the population. It is rather similar to a policy towards the National Health Service that simply looks after the interests and needs of consultants and ignores the needs of nurses. That is the same as the one-sidedness that we see in the Government's housing policy.

The one-sided approach is exemplified in the Housing and Planning Bill, 1986 which will have its Third Reading and Report stage debate in two day's time. That Bill is a measure of the Government's preoccupations. Does it attempt to tackle the need for additional home building? The answer is no. Does it attempt to tackle the need for a better improvement policy or take any further that Green Paper on improvements that was published last summer and has since been forgotten? No, there is no proposal on that score. Does it do anything to meet the needs of the homeless? No, it does not. The Housing and Planning Bill proposes a series of fiddling changes around the edge in that it allows more generous discounts on the right to buy, facilitates disposals on privatisation, and extends the almost entirely abortive assured tenancy scheme.

When he was speaking about privatisation, the Minister mentioned empty properties. He should know that over 200 properties are standing empty in Fulham Court, an estate that has been deliberately left to go to rack and ruin by the local authority while it has been attempting to sell that estate and privatise it. That is a measure of the criticism that ought to be directed at local authorities that neglect housing needs in their areas.

Those are the actions of a Government who have abandoned their responsibility to meet Britain's housing needs. In their obsession to be seen to be doing something the Government are simply fiddling around the edges, neglecting all the fundamental principles of a housing policy.

In some ways I feel rather sorry for the Minister because that is not his fault. The Government's policy is being determined not by the Department of the Environment but by the Treasury and the Department of Health and Social Security. The cuts in capital investment about which I have spoken are very much the product of the Treasury. I must stress that when the Housing Bill 1980 was going through Parliament it was the clear pledge of Ministers that local authorities would be able to use their full capital receipts in order to build new houses. That pledge has been reneged on and that is real evidence of a U-turn.

There have also been cuts in subsidies. Under this Government the subsidies available to local authorities for housing revenue accounts have been cut drastically, forcing substantial increases in the real level of rents paid by tenants. Those increases were justified by Ministers at the time on the grounds that there was a generous rent rebate system to assist those tenants who could not afford them.

Shortly afterwards—here comes another U-turn—the Department of Health and Social Security decided that the cost of that increased expenditure on rebates and allowances caused by the increase in rent levels was too much. Therefore, another Government Department cut expenditure caused by increased rents, for which the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction were responsible. As a result, one is seeing an increase in poverty, in rent arrears and in misery among people who do not have the means to pay their rent and who are seeing their housing benefit cut.

If one wants a further example one needs to look no further than the miserable story of the board and lodging allowances. The Department of Health and Social Security decided to cut expenditure on board and lodging allowances because it regarded this expenditure as excessive, and as a result it is creating homelessness and causing enormous misery among young people. The Department of the Environment is powerless. It has to sit back and watch another Department effectively dictating housing policy. That is a measure of the pretty pass into which the Government have allowed their housing policy to fall.

To illustrate the absurdity of the Government housing policy I want to focus on that one issue of bed and breakfast. We have here the symbol of all that is wrong about Government policy. There is an increase in homelessness and local authorities have fewer resources to meet the needs of homelessness and are placing more and more people in bed and breakfast hotels. In parallel, single people who do not qualify for assistance under the (Housing Homeless Persons) Act 1977 have to occupy board and lodging accommodation because they cannot find a home to rent, for which the DHSS has to meet the bill. As a result, we have an increased expenditure on board and lodging and bed and breakfast when it is known that it would be cheaper to pay for new houses for tenants to occupy.

For the record, on 20 December 1985, the Minister for Social Security, in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), gave figures showing that the cost of accommodating a family with two children in board and lodging accommodation would be some £10,800 a year in Cheltenham and £13,150 in London, but if they were housed in proper council housing the cost would be just £5,060—about half the cost of keeping people in squalor and misery in bed and breakfast accommodation. That is all that would be needed to provide a decent home for such people to live in. The Minister tried to give the Labour party a lecture about finance, economics and costs. I can only say that those figures show the economic and social lunacy of the Government's policy. They are paying more for keeping people in squalor rather than investing in new homes for people in need.

The tragedy of all that is that the unmet housing needs in Britain are not so massive as to make it impossible for Britain, if it wanted, to go a long way towards eliminating homelessness and bad housing conditions. If there were a political will and a realistic programme over the next 10 to 15 years, we could go an enormous way towards ensuring that few people, if any, had to suffer the misery of homelessness and we could eliminate slum conditions.

However, we do not have the political will at the moment and as a result we are suffering the problems that I have identified. We require a programme that ensures more investment in house construction and improvement, not a massive return to the days of high-rise and system building — that is not needed — but a sustained programme providing traditionally built houses that people want. That, sustained over 10 to 15 years, would ensure that there were sufficient homes to meet needs.

A programme of improvement, carried out by housing associations and public authorities, with an effective improvement grant system, not subject to a stop-go approach, would ensure that we tackle the backlog of bad conditions, with local authorities playing a major role in improving conditions on their poorer estates. That requires money. Not only would it improve homes but it would ensure additional employment and would go some way to tackle the scourge of unemployment.

We need a fairer subsidy system. How can we honestly proceed with a subsidy system which ensures open-ended largesse to those people who are lucky enough to be buying their homes and paying the highest rates of tax through the mortgage interest system, when we are cutting housing benefits to the poorest tenants who depend on that benefit to try to make ends meet?

Someone with an income of over £30,000 a year would qualify for some £1,480 a year in tax relief. Someone with an income of £4,000 to £5,000 a year would qualify for about £250 in mortgage tax relief. The Labour party is not opposed to tax relief. We are in favour of helping owner-occupiers, but we are opposed to the gross distortion of tax relief which ensures that the greatest benefit goes to the wealthiest. Of the £4·75 billion that went on tax relief, over £1 billion of tax relief went to people with incomes of over £20,000 a year. How can the Government justify that when they are cutting housing benefits to people on incomes of £5,000 a year?

Finally, there is the need for freedom of choice, which requires a healthy rented sector as well as an owner-occupier sector. It requires the choice of renting from the council or from a housing association and the choice to buy. Those choices require a reasonable supply of accommodation and a fair subsidy system, recognising that people have different preferences at different stages in their lives. Older and younger people may want to rent and they may in the meantime wish to own a home. They should not be trapped into one tenure for their lifetime. They should have the option to move from one tenure to another.

That new approach, advocated by the Labour party, requires a recognition, first, of the extent of the crisis—a recognition of the needs—and, secondly, investment to meet those needs, together with the political will to carry such a policy through until the scourges of homelessness and bad housing are no longer the blot they are at the moment on British society.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): It is with the greatest honour and pleasure that I welcome the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) to the House and congratulate him on his excellent maiden speech. It is evident that we have a first-class authority on housing on the Opposition Benches and I look forward to his contributions over the years. I hope that it will not be too long before he obtains some sort of promotion.

I spent five hours one afternoon and evening recently canvassing in Fulham and I want to support what the hon. Gentleman said. There is a wide gap between the massive council estate with multi-storeyed housing, such as the Clement Attlee estate that I canvassed during those five hours, and the good rented or privately owned accommodation of the professionally up and coming people in Fulham.

It is one of the Government's aims to narrow the gap between those two extremes. I should like to pay tribute to the work of the London Docklands Development Corporation in the East End, where we now see housing for sale and the breakdown of the enormous housing estates owned by the council. Some 96 per cent. of housing in that area is owned by the council.

In addition to congratulating the hon. Gentleman, I want to back up his compliments to the former Member, the late Martin Stevens. He entered this House, together with so many of my other colleagues and myself, in 1979, and it is a compliment to his efforts that his name was mentioned on the doorstep of many council flats and homes during our canvassing. I would like to pay tribute to his efforts.

One of the Governments undertakings over the last seven years has been the priority estates programme. It is no good seeing these massive council estates with enormous voids — some 5 or 10 per cent. of houses empty — without saying, "What can we do about it?" We speak about how much homelessness there is, the lack of facilities, the lack of hot and cold water and of bathrooms in many houses. It is no good if we allow so many council houses to be empty. The best approach is to make sure that the tenants of those council estates manage their own affairs. The local authority housing management is too remote, perhaps being five, 10 or 15 miles away from the point of action. That is not good. Tenant committees are needed, with authority to spend, and to make decisions.

Where we have seen the priority estates programme working, just south of the river, we see the voids vanish within a matter of weeks and much better cost-effectiveness in the management of those estates. There are people actively wanting to live on those estates, instead of trying to get out of them. These are the advantages of local management and choice by the local tenants.

Regarding the improvement programme, I agree that the Government have seen a massive expansion, followed by something which is almost grinding down to a halt. It is that very word — expansion — which is so labour-intensive, which does not suck in imports, and which could help ease the unemployment situation in the construction industry, where there are already some 400,000 people unemployed. Something needs to be done about this.

More needs to be spent on improvements. I criticise the Government in that they have failed to allow the capital receipts which have flowed into the council coffers from the sale of council houses, in accordance with Government policy under the 1980 Housing Act, to be spent on doing up rundown housing estates. If that money is not spent now, we shall have a much bigger bill to pick up in later years. Will the present formula ensure that the more houses a local authority sells, the more it will be able to spend money on doing up those housing estates?

It is a national cake and if one authority sells perhaps 300 or 400 homes, and another sells none, they all take a share. That cannot make sense. I hope that, when we allow them to use capital receipts, it will be on the basis of being in proportion to the houses that they have sold.

I feel that the Government have made a massive change over the last seven years. They have reduced housing subsidies, which were far too high, and we have seen housing ownership and sale of council houses which I greatly applaud. There is nothing wrong in giving people what they want. The swing towards more and more private houses being built, without any drain on local authorities or the Government, is much better than having unwanted, unnecessary council houses. The Opposition's pledge to build one new council house for every one sold is silly, and will be seen as such in later years.

5.15 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I should like to add my congratulations to those already offered to the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) on his impressive maiden speech. I have had the benefit of being briefed over the years on housing issues by the hon. Member in his previous incarnation, and it was wholly appropriate that he should make his first speech to the House in this debate. Those who recall our maiden speeches in this Chamber will have envied the assurance and style with which he addressed the House. We were impressed by the sincerity which he brought to the debate, and his detailed knowledge of the issues involved. I am sure the whole House looks forward to hearing him again on this and other issues.

The motif of choice, freedom and fairness now seems to be the watchword when it comes to discussion of housing issues. I echo what I took to be the message from the hon. Member for Fulham—that those are not the priorities, important though they be. The first priority must surely be greater investment. We are simply not building enough new homes, nor are we investing enough in the maintenance of our existing housing stock to maintain it in a reasonable state of repair.

There is a wide measure of agreement that we now need about 145,000 new homes a year up until 1991 simply to meet the growth in the formation of new households. If we add another 60,000 to 80,000 new homes a year to make good the losses through slum clearance and changing employment patterns, that means that we ought to be building something between 205,000 and 215,000 new homes a year. We have not achieved that since 1980. The 1985 completions were only 187,000 new dwellings.

We are as a result storing up problems for ourselves. Some of those problems are hidden in the overall national statistics. It is a sad fact that the big cities and urban areas are the worst hit by our current housing problems. It is there that we find the biggest concentration of unemployment, the biggest concentrations of low incomes, and, therefore, poor housing.

Those who represent these areas know all too well what this means to ordinary people. Homelessness is growing, waiting lists are getting longer, young married couples are forced to live with their parents at the start of their married lives. Families are divided, transfers are more difficult, and overcrowding of council property is now a fact of life in many of our urban areas. All these problems we see at our advice services every week. They were problems that we were beginning to overcome in the late seventies but they have returned to haunt us, with little prospect of any early solution.

They have brought with them some new problems—for example, the problem in London of the young single homeless. It is an unusual Friday night for me when I do not have at my surgery a young person whose parents have moved away from London, leaving him high and dry. These young people are moving around sleeping on floors, occasionally in cars. This underlines the need for more investment in housing.

Looking at the condition of the existing housing stock, the Department's own survey reminds us that something like £19 billion is needed to bring housing up to a reasonable standard of repair at a cost of about £5,000 per home.

These are cold statistics. For those of us who live with the problem, they translate into things such as dampness and condensation, mould growth and fungus, which we see in council flats throughout the winter months. They translate into inadequate, inefficient heating systems, with people unable to maintain an adequate level of heating in more than one room. They mean rotting window frames, peeling paint, leaking roofs, and all the rest of the defects in rundown, inner-city council estates.

If the Minister feels that I may be making a political point, I refer him to what was said recently by the Group of Eight, the body which brings together the construction industry and the housing professionals. They went to see the Minister on 13 March, and the RIBA president, Mr. Larry Rolland, commented on what they told him. He said:

> "The Government is failing to fulfil its responsibilities in the face of massive and growing deterioration in the stock of local authority housing: the longer work is delayed, the more disproportionate will be the cost."

The Group of Eight went on to make clear

> "its view that the total amount of . . . planned spending by Government on construction was quite inadequate in relation to the scale of the problem."

That is the view of the industry and of professionals.

There are similar problems in private rented accommodation and in owner-occupied housing. Yesterday the Association of Metropolitan Authorities published the provisional results of its 1985 house condition survey in Greater London. To be fair, it shows some improvement compared to the last official survey in 1979. Only 6 per cent. of housing stock is unfit, compared to 9 per cent. in 1979. Property lacking basic amenities has dropped from 9 per cent. to 4 per cent. of the stock. That is the impact of the generous improvement grants made available up to the time of the last general election. They hit a peak of £183 million in 1984-85 but, as we all know, they are now much more tightly rationed.

The interesting thing about the survey by the AMA is its suggestion that 500,000 homes, or one home in every five, in Greater London now need repairs costing more than £5,000; that is an increase of 28 per cent. compared with 1979. Of the homes needing such repair, 54 per cent. are owner-occupied. That underlines the broad spread of the problem of disrepair in housing stock. The case for a sensible programme of repair, rehabilitation and improvement of housing is absolutely overwhelming, even on the basis of the old proverbial view that a stitch in time saves nine.

There is considerable agreement among all parties that we need greater choice in housing. For many people there is no choice. All they can do is put their names on an ever longer council waiting list because there is no way in which they will ever be able to afford homes of their own. Their income is simply too low to encompass that possibility. Others in slightly happier circumstances are restricted; they can choose only between going on to a council waiting list or buying a home of their own, even when neither choice is best for them and when both are difficult. For many young people with the necessary resources, buying is often easier than renting because it is easier to find a house to buy than to find a decent property as a sensible rent.

I think we all accept that we are looking for new forms of rented housing to meet that demand. As a result of the growing consensus, I hope we can find ways of bringing together the skills of the building societies and the other financial institutions who can generate the funds that are needed; the skills of the volume builders who can build what people want to live in; and finally the skills of the housing associations which have proved that it is possible to provide efficient and sensitive localised housing management. If we can bring together all those skills, I hope we can provide a new source of rented accommodation which we in the Alliance refer to as social housing but which will provide an alternative to local authority renting for those who desperately need rented homes.

I endorse everything that has been said so far about the need to break up large-scale, centralised, local council housing management. All too often it has proved to be neither sensitive nor efficient. We want to encourage a variety of different approaches. By all means, let us have localised management, but let us try much harder than we have in the past to encourage genuine housing co-operatives in which tenants can run their own affairs and their own homes. There is limited experience of this yet, but many tenants in my constituency say, "We could not make a worse job of it than the local authority." Some of us hope that they might do a better job.

Apart from housing co-operatives, we have advocated neighbourhood housing trusts, bringing together tenants, representatives of the council and perhaps outside experts. There is a range of different approaches under which we could devolve more power to ordinary people. The aim must be to do just that—to give tenants much more control over their homes and over their environment. If we are looking seriously for greater choice, we should be doing more to help first-time buyers by encouraging more low-start mortgages, and more shared ownership in which people buy part of their home and rent another part.

Why have the Government not persevered with the concept of "do-it-yourself" shared ownership which was tried as an experiment a couple of years ago? Housing associations acted as agencies. When people found their own home in the private market they used the housing association as a vehicle for the purpose of shared ownership. That was an imaginative scheme and it was extremely popular. I have the sense that perhaps it was not so popular with the Treasury; that may be why it was not developed to a greater extent. I hope such imaginative and enterprising schemes will be reconsidered. The home purchase assistance scheme, under which grants from public funds were made to match the savings of individuals towards a deposit, was another approach to bring home ownership within the grasp of more people.

When talking about ways of assisting people to own their own homes, it is only reasonable to deal with the interest which has been exhibited by Conservative Members in the position of the alliance on mortgage tax relief. I cannot understand why there should be confusion. We made it clear in our general election manifesto that we would retain mortgage tax relief, but that we would limit it to the standard rate of tax. That has been our position since 1983, and it remains so. I recognise from my constituency experience that tax relief is an important element in enabling people with limited means to own their own homes. Neither I nor the alliance is in the business of changing the rules of the game after people have started to play.

If we are talking about fairness, we should point out on the other side that it is not reasonable for councils to put up rents to such an extent that they can subsidise the rates charged to all ratepayers as a result of the profits made from council tenant. That is not a fair approach; nor are the cuts in housing benefit which the least well off are now suffering.

One wider problem that flows from the absence of choice in housing, is the inhibition it places on mobility. People can no longer move around the country seeking work because of the problem of moving home. Often my constituents want to move to another London borough because of a change of job. It is easier to help people to emigrate to Australia, Canada and New Zealand than to enable them to shift from one London borough to another.

There are also people who have followed the advice of the Government; they have got on their bikes and gone out to seek work. Some have come to London and have found work—even if not brilliantly paid. They then come to my advice centre on Friday nights because it is impossible to find anywhere to live in London. So they have a choice which I would not want to inflict on anyone—a job in one part of the country with no home, or a home in another part of the country and no job. It must be a priority in housing to tackle such mobility problems.

Despite the knockabout in the earlier part of the debate, there is a growing measure of agreement among all parties about the need for new approaches to housing. Housing has been a major social problem throughout the post-war period. It is about time we solved that problem. I think we are now agreed that there is no one solution, be it owner-occupation put forward by one side or council renting put forward by the other side. Both have a contribution to make, but we need to encourage many other contributions. New approaches are urgently needed if we are to get more and better housing.

If we are to get the much greater private investment which is essential to the solution of the housing problem the Government should seek to build on the growing consensus that is emerging. We will only get more private investment, if investors believe that there will be stability and a measure of agreement, whoever is in power in Whitehall. We cannot expect people to invest if they believe that housing policy will be totally changed as a result of change of Government.

Bad and inadequate housing is at the root of many of the problems of our great cities and urban areas. I hope that, even at this comparatively late stage, the Government will give the housing problem the priority that it richly deserves.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Before I say a word about the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), may I echo the congratulations of the House on the maiden speech of the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford)? It was a remarkably fine performance. He is right to come to the House and talk about housing, as he has a deep knowledge of it. When I was on the board of Shelter and he was director of SHAC, I often used to read his papers, which were of great benefit to homeless people in the country. We shall look forward to hearing from him many times on this subject. Many of us were pleased that he referred to his distinguished predecessor, Martin Stevens, a man who was greatly respected and admired in the House and in his constituency, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said.

It is a pleasure to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Woolwich—as always, because he too has a deep knowledge of housing. He and I have followed each other in housing debates many times in past years. The hon. Gentleman was right to mention the importance of tenant participation. The one thing that has clearly come out of the initiatives taken by the Government, whether it be the priority estates project or the urban housing renewal unit, is the need for new thinking in the management of existing estates. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) is well aware of this, and has said so in speeches. I think that there is a broad consensus on this matter. It is important that we develop it and concentrate on it.

I hope that my hon. Friend will make sure that the urban housing renewal unit is not simply involved in a monitoring activity but is up front pushing local authorities to get things done so that we can get effective reports back to the House of what is happening on the ground with regard to the achievement of the urban housing renewal unit.

Several Members have mentioned improvement work. My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) concentrated particularly on the capital receipts question, as did the hon. Member for Perry Barr. First, I must declare an interest, as I always do when speaking on housing and building. I am a long-standing director of a building company, and have been involved in this industry for many years.

I have said many times in the House that in my view improvement work is one of the single most vital aspects of construction activity. First, it is the most labour and craft intensive. Secondly, it is the one most directly related to the aspirations of ordinary folk in improving their own homes. Thirdly, in my view it is particularly good value for money. That is why personally I welcome the action that the Government have taken over the years in substantially increasing the improvement grant programme.

I interrupted the hon. Member for Perry Barr, to ask him to give the figures. He had, perfectly properly from his point of view, contrasted the public sector housing build starts of this Government and their predecessor.

Mr. Rooker: That is not true. I took the national building programme, public and private together. I never at any time distinguished between the public sector and the private sector.

Mr. Latham: I stand immediately corrected by the hon. Gentleman, and accept what he says. However, I think that he would also say—because he referred to public sector starts—that that was particularly in his mind. Both he and the hon. Member for Fulham made a contrast between this Government and their predecessor in regard to public sector starts. There is no doubt that there has been a significant reduction in public sector starts under this Government.

Everybody knows, as the hon. Member for Woolwich hinted, that housing thinking has moved on since the 1960s. We no longer talk, as Anthony Greenwood did, of 250,000 council houses a year. These mass building programmes are no longer necessary or desirable. They have created the very problems that the House is addressing today and that were addressed by both the Minister and the hon. Member for Perry Barr, from the Front Bench. The problems of squalor, social deprivation, tower blocks and so on came directly from the mass building programmes of the 1960s and 1970s.

The Government have been right, in my view, to shift the emphasis in two directions — first, towards improvement work and secondly, to encouraging people to get into home ownership. There has been a significant increase in that regard, about which I shall say a word later.

I am disappointed that there has been a reduction in the number of improvement grants in the last year or so. Having said that, and having been critical of the Green Paper which was produced last year by my hon. Friend's predecessor, I accept immediately that there was a need for change and reform in the improvement grant system. Improvement grants were being made to people who did not need them. This was said by the Select Committee on Public Accounts, on which I serve, and it has been accepted that there was a need for change. Nevertheless, I urge my hon. Friend to bring forward new Government proposals. Last year's Green Paper has in effect disappeared down a black hole, so let us have some new proposals and a reasonably steady level of provision of improvement sector work.

I wish to make a suggestion to my hon. Friend which I have made before in the Public Accounts Committee and on the Floor of the House. In my view there is a very real case for transferring responsibility for improvement grant work to the building societies, lock, stock and barrel. To all intents and purposes the local authorities act as agents for central Government in this regard. The vast majority of the money advanced by local authorities for improvement grant work is refunded by the Government in form of loan, grant or whatever.

That being so, there is a real case—I am a vice-president of the Building Societies Association—for telling the building societies movement as a whole, particularly in the new era of greater freedom that will result from the Building Societies Bill which is now before the House, "Here is the figure that we as the Government are prepared to offer you this year and next year in improvement work. Take it, recycle it and offer it to people by way of improvement grants. You can charge an administration cost of 1 or 2 per cent." That is how it will be dealt with — no clawbacks, no holdbacks, no penalties, no targets and no bureaucratic problems of staffing such as local authorities have. In that way, we would deliver a more effective improvement grant programme to the people of this country. I commend that thought to my hon. Friend for serious consideration.

As for shoddy workmanship and cowboys, which were mentioned by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, I express some disappointment to my hon. Friend about the response of the Green Paper and about the lack of action since. The Green Paper of last year said that the Government hoped that the building societies and builders would have discussions to ascertain whether the building societies were prepared to limit finance—mortgage or grant—to builders who were covered by a warranty scheme.

There is no need for any further discussion. This should be got on with now. In the same way, local authorities should be restricting their grants to responsible builders who have proper warranty schemes. This was recommended several years ago by the Director General of Fair Trading. I believe that the time for action is now, and I hope that my hon. Friend will talk it over with the Department of Trade and Industry to get something done about it. As the Director General of Fair Trading has shown, far too many people are getting ripped off by cowboys and shoddy workmanship. Every hon. Member knows this, from his constituency postbag.

The time for action is now, with no more discussions or working parties. There are clear proposals, and warranty schemes are in place. Let us get on with restricting the grant work to builders who are involved in such schemes.

With regard to private sector housing, there are five points in a private builder's game plan—finance, land, marketing, buildings and sales. Marketing and sales are entirely a matter for the industry. They are not within the control of Government or part of Government. Building is effectively controlled by the National Housebuilding Council, and I would like to see the council involving itself in improvement work also. On finance—about which I asked the Prime Minister a question today—all the signs are that we are moving into an era of lower mortgage rates, which is welcomed by every hon. Member and by millions of home owners. All the mechanisms, therefore, are in place for a substantial increase in private sector housebuilding in the coming 12 to 15 months, and there is no reason why that should not be so.

It is important that we achieve consensus on the one matter that has not been mentioned at all this afternoon, and which is not mentioned in either the motion or the amendment — the question of land and planning. I do not know the Labour party proposals on that matter; they were certainly not included in the policy document put to its party conference last year.

As we approach the election—I hope and expect this Government to be returned to office, but Britain is a democracy and people will look at different proposals—I hope that the Labour party will not come forward with proposals for community land acts, land commissions, large development land taxes and all the other things that stifled the market in the past.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The private sector built more houses for sale, as did the volume builders, under the previous Labour Government than it has under this Government, despite the Community Land Act.

Mr. Latham: I remember serving for hours and hours and hours on the Committee stage of that Bill, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury). If the hon. Gentleman really thinks that the building industry believes that the Community Land Act did it any good, I suggest that he talks to it——

Mr. Roberts: I did not say that.

Mr. Latham: I know that the hon. Gentleman did not say that, but the reality is that the Act had a severe cramping effect on the industry. Let us continue with consensus on this matter.

I agree with the hon. Member for Fulham that we need more housing debates. I really want to hear more about the vital role that land and planning have to play in the release of housing for our people.

I commend my hon. Friend the Minister on his start as Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction. He is showing great energy and dash, and I wholeheartedly support him.

5.41 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): It was a pleasure to listen to the maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford). I am sure that he dearly wanted to get off his chest the good speech that he made, especially in view of his activities before entering the House. Many of us felt that way when we made our maiden speeches.

I want briefly to speak against the Government's amendment, which I believe to be hypocritical in view of their housing record over the past six years. There has been a reduction in the housing investment programme allocations of about 70 per cent. under this Government, and some of the legislation of the past two years has done nothing to meet the housing need. I refer especially to the Housing Defects Act 1984. The Opposition did not oppose its passage through the House, although we frequently warned about its pitfalls. Indeed, the Act is seriously defective in what it sets out to do.

Four villages in my constituency have large estates of houses classified as defective under the Act. The Act gives the Rotherham metropolitan borough council the responsibility to make grants to reinstate those homes to a standard where they are saleable and mortgageable. It also gives the council power to buy back those homes from people who have bought them from public bodies. However, the council is in tremendous difficulties with the implementation of the Act.

One major problem is that there is no reinstatement scheme to repair Reema houses. We are still waiting for a scheme to be accepted by the Department of the Environment so that money can be awarded. There is also the problem of lack of funds.

The Minister spoke about what the Government have been doing on housing, and he referred to Labour authorities such as Sheffield and Lambeth. It is a pity that he did not go a few miles down the road from Sheffield to Rotherham, which has a serious housing problem. Its housing investment programme allocation for the financial year 1986-87 has been cut by just under £1 million, from £7 million to £6 million. In 1985, when the HIP allocation was £7 million, it also had an allowance of £117,000 to spend under the Housing Defects Act to alleviate problems on these estates. There is no such money this year. The Minister has made available an additional £30 million to assist local authorities which have been obliged to sort out problems under the Act, but not one penny of that new money will go to the Yorkshire and Humberside region — it has been spread between the south-west and the midlands.

That leaves the question of what we do on those estates, given the attitude of the owners of the houses that have not been sold. I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members face this problem. The Act provides that people who bought houses from public bodies should receive help. The problem in my constituency, however, is what to do about the houses on the estates still in the hands of public bodies such as the National Coal Board.

The NCB has told me on numerous occasions that its policy has been to sell those houses to the sitting tenants. However, that cannot happen under the Act because grant would not be available to reinstate the homes to mortgageable standard. The NCB has also offered whole estates to the local authority. Indeed, before this Government took office my local authority bought a whole estate at Laughton Common. It has resold nine of those houses, and is quite prepared to do the same with the remainder of the estate if money is forthcoming. People living on the estate are secure in their belief that the local authority will do that. However, it no longer has any funds to buy such estates and, indeed, would not wish to do so because they are now classified as defective under the Act.

Another option suggested by the NCB is to sell the houses on the open market. On 6 December 1985, during my Adjournment debate on this matter, the Minister said that he had good news for the Rother Valley. He said:

"I understand that a private sector party is interested in acquiring a considerable number of the National Coal Board's empty Reema properties in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I can give the House the good news that agreement has now been reached on the sale of 21 vacant NCB houses in Maltby. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be as pleased as I am to hear that news." — [Official Report, 6 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 603.]

My information is that that sale fell through because the buyer discovered that he could not obtain assistance under the Act to repair the houses, if that became necessary, so that they would be at a standard in which people could live.

Currently, the NCB appears about to accept an offer for both the empty and the tenanted houses on the Maltby estate, with more than 250 houses now up for sale. The Minister will know what I said about this matter in December, and I shall not change what I said then. If it is true, as we read on the Order Paper, that the Government have been so good in dealing with housing, I want to know from the Minister what will happen on that estate.

If the 250 homes are sold to the private sector, it presumably will not have the money that the Minister has talked about to reinstate them, to bring them up to a stage at which they will be mortgageable. Indeed, whoever buys the homes may decide that people can live in them for another 10 years, paying rent, so that the price paid for them will be recouped and the homes can then be discarded. What will happen when the Housing Defects Act is implemented on that estate by the local authority? For the other 98 homes there will supposedly be grants so that they can be brought up to a mortgageable level. They will be reinstated and made good. Presumably the other 250 homes will remain in a state of disrepair.

I warned the Minister in December that the Housing Defects Act was deficient and would leave many problems unsolved unless the Minister took action. My local authority believes that that is still the situation. It has been asked to give grants under the Housing Defects Act to bring the 98 houses at Maltby up to a mortgageable level, but at the same time no help has been provided for the other 250 houses. This makes nonsense of the matter. Indeed, it is wrong to ask the local authority to spend public money in this way, because even when that money has been spent and the 98 homes are reinstated it may still be impossible to sell them because of the condition of the neighbouring houses, which could even be attached. Thus, the problem that we have had since the Act was put on the statute book has still not been solved.

We really need action now, so that we can protect the tenants and home owners on these estates. Maltby seems to be in the firing line at present because of the attitude of the National Coal Board towards selling the tenanted homes that it owns, but I am also concerned about houses in my constituency at Kiveton Park and Aston. If there is no reinstatement of the homes being sold by the National Coal Board, at least three estates in my constituency will be blighted, not because there is any major structural default in the houses—for many years I lived on the estate at Maltby—but because of an Act introduced by the Government which protects only the people who bought homes from public bodies and does not seek to protect other homes which are presently owned by public bodies.

I shall use every opportunity that I can to bring this matter to the Minister's attention. I understand the need to compensate people who brought homes in good faith from public bodies, but a serious problem in my constituency has been created by the very Act that has compensated others, and the problem will not go away. The problem will not be solved by allowing public bodies to sell homes to the private sector. Presumably grants will not be available to reinstate such homes to the level achieved in homes bought in terms of the Act.

Even at this late stage, I ask the Minister to talk immediately to the National Coal Board to stop the sale of homes unless they are dealt with in the same way as the other 98 homes which were reinstated, so that they are brought up to the standard that is referred to in the Minister's amendment—housing fit for people to live in and bring families up in. Under the Housing Defects Act, the situation on the three housing estates in my constituency will be the opposite of the statement on the Order Paper.

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): In spite of the comments we have heard this afternoon, much has happened over the past three years to improve housing policy in this country. In particular, thanks to the policies of the Government, we have moved much closer to a true property-owning democracy. Private ownership is, and should be, the first and major plank in the nation's and the Government's housing policy. The Government should do all that is possible to encourage it. Private ownership makes people more responsible; it frees state resources; it brings greater security; it promotes family life and it improves the environment. Long may we continue to support through mortgage tax relief the sales of council houses, incentives to renovate older homes and, we hope, through the reform of the rating system, private ownership.

The second plank in our housing policy will probably continue to be public sector housing. While I believe that this is a poor option next to private ownership, nevertheless, it is invaluable especially in areas of social need. However, necessary as it is, it should be a diminishing part of the nation's housing policy, because there is no reason why state resources should be deployed where private individuals are capable of providing for their own housing needs. This afternoon I wish to speak about the smallest plank in our nation's housing policy, and I refer to the private rented sector.

Mr. Allan Roberts rose——

Mr. Woodcock: I will not give way at this stage.

The private rented sector was once the largest plank in the nation's housing policy, but it is now, I am delighted to say, the smallest. But, while it is the smallest plank, it is still a necessary part of our housing policy, and an area that successive Governments have attempted to reform. However, far from improving the situation, they have helped to destroy that plank. How has that happened? One central reason is that successive Governments have paid more attention to electoral advantage than to what is fair, reasonable and in the best long-term interests of the housing market. The fact is that there always have been and always will be more tenants than there are landlords, and that has tempted Governments of both persuasions to carry forward reforms that are popular with tenants and to ignore reforms that might be popular among landlords. The result has been a continuing decline in the private rented sector; an increased reluctance to relet properties by private landlords; an increase in interest by irresponsible landlords; and a grave shortage of accommodation. All this has been to the advantage of no one.

There will always be those who choose or need to rent, such as young people who are either not earning enough or have no desire to buy their own home at that point of their lives; people who stay in an area for only a relatively short time, such as transient and temporary workers; people who tragically are from broken marriages; people who prefer to rent privately rather than from the public sector; people who prefer not to live on council estates; and people who want something better than the public sector can provide. All these people need a healthy private rented sector, and they find it almost impossible to find the kind of place they wish to rent.

On the other hand, thanks largely to the Government's policies, a vast number of people in this country have money that they wish to invest. Some people recognise the advantage of investing in property. Many people would be willing to invest in the private rented sector if they could get fair treatment. Those two groups—those who want to rent property and those who could provide the property to rent — should come together. However, far from encouraging that, our present policies are preventing it. Our laws have moved too far in terms of protecting tenants and have failed to consider the legitimate interests of landlords. By passing successive rent legislation, this House has added to the national housing problem and prevented many people from obtaining a decent roof over their heads.

No one will deny that there are bad landlords and that tenants, like other consumers, need protection from unscrupulous people. However, landlords also need a fair deal. I therefore ask the Government why it should not be possible for landlords and tenants freely to agree rents that are legally enforceable. Why are local authorities entitled to register rents of private property even in cases where neither the landlord nor the tenant wants that to happen? In so doing, they help to destroy the private rented sector in an area, an opportunity that some Left-wing councils exploit to the full.

Why should it be possible for local authorities to continue the registration process, even when the tenant in whom they had an interest has left the property? Why should it be possible for private landlords to be barred from representing themselves in county courts on possession actions, when tenants are free to represent themselves? Why do county courts continually, year after year, have such backlogs of actions that landlords are denied justice merely by the passage of time? Why should it not be possible for county courts to enforce their judgments on housing matters?

Mr. Marlow: Would my hon. Friend like to point out to the Labour party that many of those "landlords" are little old ladies who have been left a small asset by their husbands, which nevertheless forms a significant part of their income? If the Labour party cared, it would probably care for some of those old ladies.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The hon. Gentleman should declare his interests.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman knows them.

Mr. Woodcock: My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is quite right. Landlords come in all shapes and sizes, as do politicians. But far from discouraging investment in the private rented sector, we would do well to encourage it. That would be to everyone's advantage. I shall give one further and very valid reason for the Government taking action over the private rented sector. The present Rent Acts significantly contribute to unemployment. Government interference in a free housing market results in considerable waste and in a lot of overuse and underuse of accommodation. Above all, it leads to an immobility of labour.

We have heard much about the need for unemployed people to get on their bikes in search of employment. My constituency has a very high unemployment rate. Many people have told me that they have been round the country searching for jobs, but find that local authorities are unwilling to provide accommodation——

Mr. Allan Roberts: Unable.

Mr. Woodcock: Local authorities are unwilling and unable to provide accommodation unless the person has a job. However, the person cannot get a job unless he has a house. The law does not help the private rented sector to meet that need.

Professor Patrick Minford, one of the best known monetarist economists in this country, recently claimed in an article in the Economic Affairs magazine that one fifth of the rise in unemployment since 1960 could directly be explained by our Rent Acts. Perhaps the Minister will take note of Professor Minford's arguments.

I shall make a few suggestions about how my hon. Friend the Minister could improve housing, and could demonstrate the Government's professed belief in the private rented sector. First, why not make rent agreements freely entered into by landlords and tenants legally binding? Secondly, either remove the local authority's statutory right to register rents on private property, or give local authority tenants the same statutory right to a fair rent as private tenants have. Thirdly, remove the county court's discretion to bar landlords from representing themselves in possession actions. Fourthly, require county courts to enforce their own possession judgments. Fifthly, give a statutory right to have possession cases heard quickly. Sixthly, make shorthold tenancies enforceable for a term agreed at the outset. Finally, make fair rents payable on registration, at the time when they are deemed to be fair, and not a year later.

If the Government did those things, there would be a significant improvement in the nation's problems, a terrific increase in private investment, a freeing of state resources, and the Government would demonstrate their belief in the private rented sector as well as making a considerable improvement to the unemployment problem. The Government have shown themselves willing to take actions which may not be electorally popular but which they believe to be right and just. I ask whether the time has not come for the Government to take such actions in the private rented sector.

6.3 pm

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I intend to be brief in this all too short debate. Unlike many hon. Members, I am not a housing expert. Of course, I exclude the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock) from the charge of having some expertise. However, one does not need to be an expert to recognise the housing problems that exist. I make no apology for saying that I shall relate my remarks to the housing problems that the Government are causing my constituents. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), I shall devote my speech—much of which has been shed because of the lack of time—to doing just that. My local authority is little different from many others, at least in the Greater Manchester area. Consequently, many of my points are quite general.

The House will know that in its 1983 manifesto the Tory party clearly said:

"Our goal is to make Britain the best housed nation in Europe".

One did not have to listen too long to the excellent maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) to know that that is already a pretty sick joke. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said, both public and private sector housing are being hit by the Government. Council tenants are the victims of cruel cuts in the housing budget, which is barely a third of what it was under the last Labour Government. People in the private sector are being hit by the clampdown on improvement grants. Many owners are trapped in homes needing major repairs, but they cannot afford to do them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr has recently visited Tameside and can vouch for what I am about to say. That local authority has over 5,000 families whose homes are unfit for habitation, and more than 10,000 council homes — half its stock — which do not have adequate heating. About 1,000 of the pre-war council homes are in urgent need of modernisation. Perhaps I can attract the attention of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) by saying that they have problems in Leicester also. Indeed, it is a pity that we do not hear more about them from the hon. Gentleman.

Such problems are not confined to the public sector. In the private sector in Tameside, 3,000 homes are unfit for habitation and 2,500 lack basic amenities. Indeed, 12,130 properties need repairs costing over £3,000 per property, and 7,000 of them need repairs that will cost in excess of £7,500 per property. The cost of outstanding repairs to the pre-1919 properties in the private sector is estimated to be £103 million, or 31 times the council's renewal budget for 1985-86.

Those are the startling facts that we have to face when we go back to our constituencies and surgeries and hear about the sad cases of our constituents. Moreover, 1,135 Tameside families have been accepted as homeless. there are 6,000 on the general waiting list. A further 3,220 people are seeking transfers for one reason or another. Almost 2,700 of them are pensioners. Indeed, 1,500 are aged over 70. About 1,500 single people aged under 25 are also on the waiting list. From my surgery I know of one casualty of the system who is aged 65. She is a widow with an artificial leg, and she suffers from bronchitis. Her home in Hyde, in which she has lived for the past 40 years, is crumbling. She has an outside toilet and a stone sink, and her home is bitterly cold in winter. The council scheme to modernise it is estimated to cost £11,000, but has been postponed because of Government action.

By now the House will have a good idea of the problems in my constituency, but I must go on. The recitation of these facts may be tedious to Conservative Members, but the problems are rather more than tedious to those who have to face them day in, day out. Tameside's housing investment programme allocation for 1985-86 is worth only 45 per cent. of the value in 1979-80 and that causes us great concern. Its housing investment programme bid for 1985-86 was £23·5 million, but the actual allocation was just over £10 million. How can the local authority be expected to cope with such immense problems? I hope that the Minister will give us a hint when he replies. However, I very much doubt whether he is even listening to the debate.

The cut in this year's programme has meant that Tameside's plan to build 140 new dwellings has been shelved, and there are no new public sector starts for 1985-86. Plans to modernise 450 council properties have been cut, and now only 240 properties are included. Tameside's bid for its programme this year was estimated by the council to be £24·7 million. The Government promised it £10 million, but the actual amount is £8·4 million. I hope that as a result of this debate the Under-Secretary of State will at least review the shabbily low figure that has been provided for my local authority.

As my hon. Friends who represent other constituencies in Tameside know, because we are forever telling the House, Tameside is a low-wage area. More than 75 per cent. of council house tenants are in receipt of housing benefit. The financial circumstances of most of those people mean that they cannot even consider owning a house. As many of my colleagues have said, purchasing a house is not an option available to them. It is an academic question.

The council estimates that a total housing programme of £42 million per annum sustained over a five-year period, is needed, to make meaningful inroads into the housing problems in my borough. The council and I recognise that the amount available will not be anywhere near £42 million per annum, but we expect to receive a more realistic sum.

Recently, the chairman of the housing committee in my constituency, Councillor Peter Baily, sent the Minister a document entitled, "The Case for Housing Investment in Tameside". If the Minister has lost the document, I can provide him with another copy. If he reads it, he will recognise that there are gigantic problems. This morning the chairman of the housing committee said to me:

"The size of the problem in this borough can only be resolved by an injection of Government cash of sizeable proportions and releasing hundreds of local skilled building craftsmen who are languishing on the dole."

I am sure that those comments could be echoed by other hon. Members.

I promised you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I would speak briefly. Therefore, I conclude by saying that the Minister must recognise that one reason why the Government lost the Fulham by-election and are doing badly in the polls is that they do not have a socio-economic strategy for salvaging local housing. In view of the Government's unpopularity, I hope they will consider that now is the right and proper time to do something positive. If they do not do so, it will be just another nail in their coffin. I assure the Government that when their funeral takes place there will be a rush by many of the homeless people of Tameside to be pallbearers.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I suspect that not many hon. Members or people outside the House would disagree with the sentiment expressed in the title of this debate which, according to the business statement, is, "Housing — putting people first." I support that sentiment. The motion moved by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) contains sweet words and nice-sounding phrases. It contains words with which one could easily agree. Indeed, any stranger to this planet would probably support a number of aspects of the motion, but there is a problem.

Many of my hon. Friends have been involved in housing for a considerable time. We are aware that the motion, nice-sounding though it is, is in sharp conflict with the performance of the Labour party when it had the opportunity to put housing policies into practice. It is as well to recall the Labour party's performance. It sought to municipalise as much housing as possible. It had a declared policy of building as many council houses as possible and of buying up as much land as it could on which to build council houses.

A number of my colleagues have referred to some of the social and economic problems which the Government inherited simply because there was a mad scramble, in the vain hope of solving the housing problems, to build more council houses. As the waiting lists became ever longer, more council houses were built. Local authorities were on a treadmill, which resulted in a great deal of heartache and caused social and economic problems in many cities and towns.

The Labour party's policy of municipalisation did nothing to solve the housing problem. All it did was to shift the tenure of a house from owner-occupied to tenanted. I know from experience in local government that many Socialist-controlled local authorities deliberately built council estates in previously Conservative-represented wards simply to change the political balance in those wards.

Mr. Tony Banks: Nonsense.

Mr. Powley: The hon. Gentleman says that that is nonsense, but we all know that it is true. Many Labour-controlled local authorities followed that policy. The Labour Government sought to buy the council tenant's vote by one means or another. The Labour party came to office in 1974 on the promise that it would apply a rent freeze. Of course, it forgot that the housing revenue account would have to be propped up by the ratepayer. There is no such thing as a rent freeze, because at the end of the day somebody has to pay the bill. I mention a few of the Labour party's policies to emphasise that the words in the motion are one thing, while the practices have been quite the opposite.

Despite the support, or half-support, of the Labour party for the sale of council houses in one form or another, I urge caution. The Labour party's words will never be put into practice, even if it were to gain office. Housing matters are administered by local authorities. The quite definite policy of local authorities which are controlled by Labour party groups is to oppose the sale of council houses. If a Labour Government said, "Our policy is to sell council houses," would they instruct Labour local authorities to sell council houses?

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Powley: If that happened, I suspect that a way would be found for local authorities not to sell council houses. My local authority has sought, by every means possible, to oppose the sale of council houses. In 1980 it opposed the right-to-buy principle. It changed the tenure of some tenants in my area, which meant that they were unable to exercise their right to buy if they had exchanged a house. A number of means were devised by Norwich city council to inhibit the sale of council houses. I do not doubt that if it came to pass, Labour-controlled authorities would seek to inhibit the sale of council houses and deny tenants the opportunities that they desire.

I turn to a few points which are important if we are to improve the housing stock. We need to increase the number of council homes which are offered for sale, especially in my constituency, which has an abominably low level of owner-occupied housing. About 35 per cent. of homes are owner-occupied and 52 per cent. are tenanted. Those percentages must be reversed if we are to improve housing conditions in my constituency.

We need a waiting list in all areas of the country which accurately reflects true housing need and not just the wants of some people and some local authorities which seek to inflate their waiting lists just to try to convince a Minister that they need more in their housing investment programme allocation.

We need to dispose of much of the land held by local authorities and nationalised industries so that private housing can be built. We need a bigger switch of resources from new build because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) said, the need for large council house building is now virtually at an end. We need to switch our resources from new build to improvement and repair. That must go on to a greater extent than at present. We need greater efficiency among many of our local authorities for the operation and management of our council estates and the operation of our repairs and direct labour organisations, much as I dislike them.

I believe that were we to follow some of those policies, many of which were implemented by Conservative-controlled councils when they had the opportunity, there would be a distinct improvement in the quality of housing and it would reflect what the motion says. It would be putting people first in housing matters.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Two things have given me some delight this afternoon. The first was the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, (Mr. Raynsford). The authority with which he made that speech and the confidence that was displayed was, I suggest, a pleasure to all in the Chamber. I count it a privilege to be able to call him Friend rather than Member. My second delight is that we are graced with the presence of a Clerk somewhat more comely than the usual more hirsute incumbents who give us the benefit of their sterling assistance as we pursue our procedures in the Chamber.

I do not have the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) to comment on housing as a national issue. I leave that his greater expertise. However, I offer for the consideration of the House some comments on housing in my parish of Stockton in Cleveland. It is important to realise from the outset that not for ten years has Stockton district had the freedom of action in the democratic decision-making process afforded by Labour control at both national and local level.

Stockton has about 18,500 units in its housing stock. That is about a 10 per cent. reduction on the figure held in 1979 when the Government took office. Therefore, one can see that there has been an obedient, if somewhat reluctant, response to the Government's doctrinaire requirements of house sales. In the past five years, that same Government have filched more than £30 million from the subsidy of the housing revenue account. In 1979 that subsidy was £4 million per year. Extrapolating from that, based on an index of escalation — even the deliberately misleading index published by the Government's ministry of massage parlours — the subsidy should now stand at more than £6 million per year. In fact, it is nil. It was zero last year and the year before.

The last time the Government gave any positive direct financial support to the housing revenue account was five years ago, when they chipped in the princely sum of £13,000—not even the cost of a dog kennel in Dulwich. The Government have filched £30 million when more than 27 per cent. of Stockton district council's housing stock is more than 25 years old and badly in need of major renovation and the urgent attention that that term implies.

It is true that in Stockton at present the average basic rent is £18·12 per unit per week. It can be logically reasoned from that that if the Government were now providing subsidy in real terms, as they profess, and as previous Governments did, that rent would be a mere £12 per week. In other words, they have deliberately imposed, through policy decisions, a £6 per week deduction from the pockets of Stockton tenants. That is a cynical and Scrooge-like mechanism to squeeze the most from those who can afford the least.

Stockton's spend this year under the housing investment programme will be £13·5 million. If the Government had not sought to interfere over the intervening years, it would have been nearly £30 million, much more in line with real needs if we bear in mind the terms of the motion and the amendment which is to provide "good housing with responses to family and individual needs".

I shall turn briefly to Stockton's housing capital programme. It is true that, under a Labour Government, Stockton district council averaged 330 new builds per year, even under a Tory-controlled council. Now, under the Tory Government, it can achieve an average of only 55.

However, under the Government's restrictions, the council has managed to average a yearly total of 540 housing improvement completions. That is despite the fact that its total bid over the previous five years for housing improvement was £64·5 million and its sanction allocation from the Government has been a mere £23 million. That is 74·5 per cent. less that it deems necessary. In this year alone the Government have limited their housing investment programme allocation to £3·3 million, when Stockton has provided hard evidence that more than £15 million is necessary, even by the Government's own standards.

How then, with all those restrictions, has Stockton council succeeded in averaging 540 housing improvements with all the odds stacked against it? It has been done by imaginative application of initiative and creative accounting—in the interests of its tenants, of course.

Mr. John Patten: Tell us more about that.

Mr. Cook: I shall tell you in a minute.

Mr. Rooker: Do not tell them.

Mr. Cook: If the Government dispute that, are they saying that the houses should not have been refurbished? The creative accountancy took the form of exploiting loopholes left in the Government's restraints. [Laughter.] My hon. Friends know, regardless of the Tories' hilarity, that we have now learned that the Government intend to close those loopholes. In other words, not only does the regime want to halt housebuilding, it wants to stop renovation schemes too. Otherwise, what is its motivation for pursuing such measures?

In the brief time left, I wish to make specific reference to Stockton's submission for assistance under the urban housing renewal programme and the community refurbishment scheme for the Clarences in Cleveland, where conditions are appalling. I challenge the Minister to visit that estate to see for himself the distress imposed upon tenants whose only crime is imposed indolence and concomitant low incomes. If the Minister will not agree to visit the area, will he at least consent to examine this small album of photographs which graphically record that estate's grievous need for urgent assistance — proof positive of the need for response to family and individual needs. I am confident that he will then give a positive response to Stockton's application on behalf of the Clarences.

In support of that, I quote Stockton housing department's most recent report:

"If a decision should be delayed until September"—

I hope that the Minister is listening; he appears not to be—

"or October of this year, then obviously it will not be possible to spend any money that might be allocated before March of 1987."

That means that the inhabitants of that estate could well be condemned to a further three winters exactly like the last. A decision is needed now. Can the Minister please assure me that he will give that matter his most urgent attention?

6.29 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): It is my most pleasant duty to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) on both his election and his maiden speech. Many people have to come to the House and build a reputation but my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham comes to the House with an established reputation. I have known my hon. Friend for many years. He has worked with Housing Advice, and for the housing association movement, and is greatly respected. My hon. Friend is fortunate to come to the House with such a reputation and I am sure he will establish a similar one for himself on other matters.

My hon. Friend's success in the by-election was not simply a personal triumph. All the opinion polls in Fulham revealed that the two major issues were housing and unemployment. The electorate in Fulham gave a decisive and unequivocal verdict about the Government's policies on those two major issues. Those matters will determine the results of other elections in many seats in the next general election.

The Opposition have proposed the motion tonight because we believe that people should come first and have a right to a home at a price that they can afford, with choice and flexibility over where they live, control over their own homes and environment and the right to a home that is dry, warm, and well maintained. A home with such characteristics is an essential precondition to a happy and healthy life, to the stability of the family, to mobility of employment, and to security and contentment in old age. We believe that caring about people means caring about their homes.

There are two tragic aspects of Britain's housing conditions today. The first is the condition of the housing stock. Some 3·9 million families live in homes which are either unfit for human habitation, lack the basic amenities or are in need of substantial repair. Those figures are based on returns recently sent to the Department of Employment on the housing investment programme returns. I can also quote the figure of just under 100,000 families who last year were literally homeless and vulnerable. That is an escalating, shameful and costly total.

Another measure of the tragic state of Britain's housing is revealed in the description by the Audit Commission. The Audit Commission is no ally of the Labour party and it does not write our political pamphlets. It certainly does not write them in Lambeth. The commission did not misuse language when it described the crisis in council housing and the 85 per cent. of council-owned dwellings requiring repairs and improvements. I could continue to cite the condition of people and their homes and the increasing number of people who live in homes that are damp or in poor repair, with leaking roofs, dry rot, and so on. Many of these people are owner-occupiers, the elderly or the less well-off, who are the victims of the current recession.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: No, I will not give way.

The main feature about the housing crisis is that there is no division between the tenant and the owner-occupier. It is becoming more and more apparent from the crisis that there is a community of interest between those who live in the poorer owner-occupied homes, those in the privately rented sector, and those in council accommodation. All these people share the consequences of the famine of funds that has been imposed by the Treasury and probably reluctantly agreed to by the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction. The Treasury has done for the homeless of this country what drought did for the hungry in Africa.

The second tragic aspect of British housing is that the acute shortages and the poor condition of much of the housing stock is actually avoidable. We are not faced with an act of God; rather we are faced with a tragedy which I should perhaps not call man-made or person-made, but woman-made. It is a woman-made disaster.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham said, the political will is lacking. There is no shortage of funds to invest in housing in Britain. All of us with mortgages receive letters from the building societies inviting us to spend more of their money. Each building society is competing with the other to lend money. The building societies in turn are competing with the banks to lend money and both institutions are awash with cash. The local authorities are not short of money to spend on housing. Indeed, the amount of capital receipts which are unspent and largely unspendable, at £6,000 million, is four times greater than the housing investment programme permitted by the Government on the last occasion.

The real Minister for Housing is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Treasury is more in the business of forging shackles for local authorities than in the business of building homes. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) spoke about loopholes. He should have taken care, as his words were given careful attention by that stooge of the Treasury who calls himself the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction. We heard the Minister asking for more details about the loopholes from a sedentary position because he will want to work that information into his draft document on the limitations of capital spending by local authorities.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Fraser: There are no insuperable problems to the solving of our housing problems. The fault lies with the Treasury and the pace at which it has allowed local authorities to spend their money or the money that is freely available on the open market.

The scale of the failure to deal with the housing problems is illustrated by the evidence of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities to the Duke of Edinburgh's inquiry. It calculated that at the present rates of building —which includes both private and public building—it would take 900 years to replace the existing housing stock. To put that another way, if William the Conqueror, who landed in 1066, had adopted in addition to administrative and constitutional changes a housing policy which involved replacing the hovels and shacks of the conquered Saxon kingdom, and if he had moved at the same rate as the Conservative Government, he would have come to the House of Commons now and said "Je l'ai fini".

The figures of new housing starts are available. If we compare the figures for the last complete year of starts under the Labour Government—1978—with the present figure, the reduction in new house starts in the public sector is approximately 92,000. That figure has not been compensated in any meaningful way by an increase in private sector housing. The completion figures are equally dismal. The Government cannot pretend that there has been a change of emphasis and that somehow private sector housebuilding has compensated for the loss of between 70,000 and 90,000 local authority homes a year while the Government have been in office. Last year, fewer houses were completed for private purchase than in 1978.

Lambeth's housing record has been attacked and compared with that of Wandsworth. However, I want to reveal a few of the facts about Wandsworth's housing programme. Last year, on the latest figures available, Wandsworth did not start one social home and it did not finish any social homes. It did not have any social housing under construction, yet, at the same time, there were 204 families either in bed and breakfast accommodation or in hostels. That statistic of no public housing was repeated in Hammersmith, Fulham, Merton, Sutton, and many of the surrounding boroughs that could make a real contribution to housing in areas of acute housing stress. That is one aspect of how local Tory boroughs follow their Tory masters in Westminster.

Last week I visited the Tory-controlled borough of Reading. That authority is not untypical of many Tory authorities. As soon as the Tories took control of the authority in 1983 they stopped building council homes, in spite of the fact that 120 families were homeless and 3,200 people were on the housing waiting list. Reading is in the affluent silicon valley and in the relatively affluent Thames Valley.

Reading reveals a new and ugly consequence of the Government's housing policy. The hoods and the heavies line up outside the post offices in Reading to collect the money from people who live in bed and breakfast accommodation before those people step off the pavement. Indeed, there have been times in Reading when the police have had to be called in to stop that ugly trade in homelessness. Homelessness has become a boom business in Britain. Millionaires make fortunes out of it.

When the police in Reading interfered with the collection of giro money for bed and breakfast accommodation, the hoods and heavies working for the landlords went round and collected the giros themselves and gave the tenants the change, making sure that the exploitation continued and the money went to those who run those squalid places. That is the picture of housing in one of the more affluent parts of Britain.

Many people are stuck because of the ending of improvement grants. I believe that about a quarter of a million people are waiting for improvement grants that have been cut as a result of the reduction in the housing investment programme.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: No, time is too short.

Someone came to see me the other day. His was a typical case. He had come from the West Indies during the second world war to join the Air Force and serve this country. In his sixties, his health became poor and he fell upon hard times. Because of his ill-health he was not able to put his repair grant application in on time. Because of the moratorium on spending, Lambeth cut out its improvement and repair grant policy, as did Croydon and many other local authorities, both Labour and Conservative. The man was beside himself. How was he to stop the rain coming through his roof? His neighbours were besides themselves, too. They did not know how they were to stop the rain coming into their houses, either.

It happened that the man suffered a stroke, so serious that a stair-lift had to be put into his house. He was therefore deemed to be so disabled as to qualify for an improvement grant on compassionate grounds.

That is the scale of the problem of housing and repair improvement grants. It is repeated in many other districts. Many people who are fortunate enough to be able-bodied live in despair and terror about what is to become of their homes. There is no opportunity for them to resort to rented housing. That is what has happened to housing as a direct result of the Government's policy.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: The grants boom before the 1983 election was bribery, but we welcomed it. However, within a year that pattern of grant had been cut by 40 per cent., and cuts are still being made.

The Government have a housing policy with gimmicks. There is the urban housing renewal unit. There is clause 5 of the Housing and Planning Bill, for evicting tenants. We will discuss that on Thursday. However, what Government policy amounts to is a row of gimmicks and no guts. It is a policy that is increasingly earning—as in Fulham two weeks ago—the outrage and contempt of the public.

The Labour party has the necessary political will. The funds are available; there is enough money in the kitty to deal with the housing problem. We shall use energy, ingenuity and investment to increase the provision of housing across all forms of tenure. We have no ideological attachment to renting, buying or indeed swapping between different tenures. Our ideological attachment is to the meeting of need, and we have no obsession with tenure. We will emphasise quality as well as quantity—quality of construction, conversion, management and cost in use. We reject a housing programme based on the proposition that if people are hungry enough they will eat.

We also believe that as far as possible there should be a choice of tenures and the chance to change from one form of tenure to another. We believe in the development of a subsidy system that is fair across the tenures and is geared to meeting need and stimulating housing investment. In the case of mortgage interest relief, the greatest benefit goes to the higher rate taxpayers. We believe in fairness across the tenures, and that is what we shall achieve.

Our emphasis will be on people and their wishes and choices. We reject a housing policy in which a year of spend, spend, spend, such as 1982, can be followed a year later by cut, cut, cut. We reject a policy based on an obsession with tenure and little else, and we reject Tory policies that are a shabby abdication of the Government's central responsibility for meeting housing need. We reject those policies and ask the House to support our motion.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I begin on a happy note by joining all those who have complimented the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) on his maiden speech. I make no secret of the fact that I spent several hours in Fulham trying to impede the hon. Gentleman's entry to the House. Like other hon. Members, I was struck by the depth of affection and warmth shown to his predecessor, Martin Stevens, to whom many people have paid tribute.

The hon. Gentleman made a well-informed speech. That is no less than I would expect from someone whose organisation has been funded by my Department for eight years. I see that the miserly £69,000 paid to SHAC in 1978 had been generously increased to £128,300 by 1985.

In housing terms the hon. Member's status in Fulham is that not of a secure tenant, but a licensee. He is well known as a housing expert and I am sure that we will all welcome his contribution to debates on the subject.

I have a small quarrel with the hon. Gentleman. I believe that he said that for every £100 spent on housing under Labour £30 is spent now. Those figures conveniently omit capital receipts, and are based on HIP allocations. If he includes capital receipts, and arrives at the figure that is spent rather than the provision, he will find that the answer is somewhat different.

Whatever mistake the hon. Member for Fulham may have made pales into insignificance in comparison with what the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) has just said. He said that he regretted the ending of improvement grants. In 1979 we spent £90 million on improvement grants. Last year we spent £450 million. Yet the hon. Gentleman has the audacity to say that improvement grants have been ended. In fact, much more money is being spent in that way than was spent under Labour.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) endorsed the priority estates project. The project has encouraged the local management of tenanted estates. Measures contained in the Housing and Planning Bill, which we are to discuss on Thursday, are designed to continue and accelerate the progress of innovation in forms of tenure and management.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) mentioned the AMA survey. I believe that he gave a somewhat partial quotation. The survey indeed shows that the number of properties needing repairs that would cost more than £5,000 rose slightly from 18 to 19 per cent. What the hon. Gentleman did not say was that the study also suggests that the number of statutorily unfit dwellings fell from 9 to 6 per cent. of the stock, and of dwellings lacking standard amenities from 9 per cent. to 4 per cent.

Mr. Cartwright: The hon. Gentleman should read Hansard tomorrow. I mentioned that point.

Mr. Young: I shall be delighted to read that in Hansard. The picture given in the AMA survey was not all bad.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about do-it-yourself shared ownership. My Department wrote to all local authorities in January 1983 telling them that they no longer needed specific approval from my Department to carry out do-it-yourself shared ownership. I understand that a small number are doing so. In addition, there is nothing to stop local authorities funding housing associations to carry out do-it-yourself shared ownership, and I understand that a number are doing so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) I mentioned tenant co-operatives. Everyone is in favour of tenant involvement and tenant co-operatives. He asked whether we could have progress reports on the urban housing renewal unit. I shall be happy to answer any questions about that. In opening the debate my hon. Friend said that there was an enthusiastic response, not least from the members of the AMA which had been initially somewhat hostile. The idea is that the unit should be a catalyst and should try to prod local authorities to consider new solutions for the difficult problems faced on unpopular estates.

Of course we shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion that improvement grants should be run by the building societies, but obviously that is something that we shall discuss with the Building Societies Association.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) raised a constituency matter which followed up on his recent adjournment debate. My Department is in touch with the Department of Energy concerning the houses he mentioned on the National Coal Board's estate at Maltby. My Department is considering the implication of the proposed sales to a private buyer.

On a happier note, the hon. Member mentioned a scheme for improving Reema housing. I understand that a system of repair to these houses is currently with PRC Homes Ltd. for appraisal. I shall keep the hon. Member informed of important developments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock) spoke of the need to involve the responsible private sector and to initiate some movement in that area in the interests of job mobility. My hon. Friend put forward a five-point agenda of worthwhile suggestions of how that could be done, for which we are grateful.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) reminded the House of the reluctance of some local authorities to sell council houses. The Labour party policy on the right to buy is now crystal clear. Tenants in our inner cities will have the right to buy and local authorities are to have the right not to sell. One cannot have a fairer policy than that.

The hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) made a valid point that my department should approve earlier in the year the schemes which are submitted under the urban housing renewal unit. Thus the spending can be achieved during the current year We have already approved a number of schemes this year and, of course, we intend to make decisions as soon as possible to achieve spending in the current year.

Many of us read in yesterday's press of the Labour party's campaign of freedom and fairness which is launched today. The Times said that the drive will concentrate, among other things, on housing. Some of us hoped that today's debate would witness the launch of some fresh initiative and existing new policies on housing. Nothing new has emerged from the Opposition Front Bench. Most of the sensible proposals that it put forward are already being implemented.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Where?

Sir George Young: I shall come to that in a moment.

I hope that the Opposition Front Bench can persuade its colleagues in London that housing is an important issue. I have a copy of the Labour party manifesto for the London borough of Ealing. Of its 81 pages, four cover the policy for policing in Ealing and 10 cover policies for women —including a policy for banning suggestive calendars at the works depots. But how much is there on housing? Twenty-one lines in the manifesto are devoted to housing, tucked away in the planning and environment section. There is more space on nuclear policy, on fairs, circuses and zoos, and on animal products, than there is on housing. In Ealing we shall have an exciting new policy of a ban on the sale of kittens in pet shops. There will be a borough pet-watch scheme.

The section on housing contains no new ideas, but simply a commitment to a massive campaign of municipal building. That is a return to the quick-build policies of the 1950s and the 1960s which were rightly condemned by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). There was no mention of partnership with the private sector, tenants' involvement, or the other ideas which were mentioned in the debate. It represents a step backwards.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) mentioned Wandsworth. Wandsworth has pursued an active sales policy—it has sold almost 7,000 council dwellings and around 4,000 of the dwellings have been bought by sitting tenants. On balance, priority has been given to council tenants who account for half the 15,000 to 20,000 potential purchasers on the council's special waiting list for the purchase of former council properties.

Co-operation with the private sector has been a great success in Wandsworth. For some estates the only realistic policy is disposal to the private sector for resale. Some have doubted whether there was a market for high-rise council blocks. Recently, however, Wandsworth successfully disposed of the Livingstone estate to Regalian Properties. That demonstrates that there is a substantial market. The first 24 refurbished flats which were put up for sale by Regalian were sold within two and a half hours of being put on the market.

The sales have provided substantial capital receipts for Wandsworth, a prescribed proportion of which can be re-invested in housing. In 1985-86 Wandsworth expected to supplement its HIP allocation of £17 million with some £36 million of capital receipts — £31 million from housing. In the past year, Wandsworth has raised more housing capital receipts than any other London borough.

Wandsworth has demonstrated that sales have not led to an increase in the waiting list if priority is given to council tenants, who help to create additional vacancies for lettings. Sales have also provided additional resources to make faster progress in tackling the problems that remain.

During the debate, there were a number of criticisms about the Government's economic policy. It is beneficial to consider some of the impacts of that policy on housing. In 1979 the mortgage rate reached 15 per cent. Since then it has fluctuated but it has now fallen to 11 per cent. and some societies hope that there will be a further reduction. A person with an average building society mortgage would have been paying £137 per month in November 1979. With the present mortgage rate of 11 per cent. that person pays £110 per month — saving £27 per month. That equates to a reduction in income tax of roughly 4p in the pound.

As interest rates fall and as earnings continue to rise, home ownership has become attainable for more people. That has enabled the public sector to concentrate its resources on those who cannot or do not want to buy. An inevitable consequence of Opposition policies would be a rise in interest rates, a rise in mortgage rates, and therefore a growing dependence of more people on the public sector.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr criticised the imposition of VAT on repairs and improvements. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman can tell the House whether the Labour party is now committed to lifting VAT on repairs and improvements? What would the cost be? From the hon. Gentleman's reluctance to come to the Dispatch Box, I take it that there is no commitment.

Mr. Rooker: When the Government imposed VAT in the 1984 Budget we said that we would remove it. That is not a new policy, it is existing Labour party policy.

Sir George Young: It is most helpful to have that commitment on the record. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that we are trying to cost the Opposition's expensive policies, and we are grateful for that further commitment.

The homeless or those on the waiting list are disadvantaged if they have to compete with more people for public sector accommodation if private accommodation for sale has been made more expensive because mortgage rates have been driven up by economic policies which push up interest rates.

The Government's economic policies have also benefited council house rents. By keeping inflation down we have enabled council rent increases to be kept at a low level. On average, weekly rents have risen by only 70p in each of the past three years. The Government's economic policies have benefited not only owner-occupiers but local authority tenants.

A couple of hon. Members mentioned improvement grants and asked for the Government's reaction to the Green Paper. The Green Paper produced some worthwhile responses. Some parts of that Green Paper have been welcomed in the debate, especially the section which asked for verification that the money had been well spent. It was suggested that the money should be linked to policies that have guarantees. Other parts of the Green Paper were not so well received. The Government will come forward with conclusions on the Green Paper as soon as possible.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr said that Labour party policy was to focus on choice, freedom and fairness. That is an excellent description of the approach to housing policy which has been followed by the Government since 1979. We welcome the conversion of Opposition Members to our point of view. In my reply to this debate I have tried, modestly, to point to some of the considerable achievements in Government policy in the past seven years. However, we are under no illusion about the scale of the problems that still remain, especially those of homelessness and of disrepair to the housing stock. We shall continue to make every effort to tackle the problems that remain, to look for new and imaginative solutions and to bring together all the available resources in both the public and the private sectors.

Despite the inevitable rhetoric in some of the speeches, there is in fact much common ground between us about the way in which we should proceed. It is on those sensible policies that we propose to make progress. I commend to the House the motion, as amended.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's approach to housing policy which combines investment in good housing with responses to family and individual needs reflecting the informed opinions of tenants and home buyers, in order to bring about solutions based upon choice, freedom and fairness; and congratulates the Government on its achievements since 1979 in fulfilling housing aspirations and improving the quality of life throughout the whole community.

Transport

7.13 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I beg to move,

That this House strongly condemns the Government for the crisis in public transport which is the direct result of de-regulation of bus services, the abolition of the metropolitan councils and the drastic reduction in finance for public transport; and urges the Government to emulate the proven success of Labour transport policies implemented by Labour councils throughout Britain, which are based upon choice, freedom and fairness, to improve the quality of life for the whole community and particularly for those who depend entirely upon public transport.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Stott: Since 1981, apart from a very brief period when I shadowed information technology, I have been on the Opposition transport team on the Front Bench. During that time I have watched the various Secretaries of State for Transport come and go. Apart from the present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, every one of them has put through legislation that has seriously weakened and undermined the principles and the concepts of an integrated transport policy. But in my view, and I suspect in the view of many other hon. Members, the Secretary of State who has done most mortally to damage Britain's public transport system is the current one, the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), the Conservative party's original Neanderthal man, someone who takes a great deal of pride in inhabiting the higher astral planes of lunacy and who, by his legislative efforts in the House of Commons, has offered up Britain's public transport system — which involves the carriage of millions and millions of people every day — to the vagaries of the free market and the discredited values of free marketeers.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stott: Not yet. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because it is a short debate, that is why.

It is only in the United Kingdom that public transport has been reduced to the status of a political football, to be kicked around the park by Conservative Ministers and councillors in an attempt to reduce revenue support, rate precepts and local accountability. Years of painstaking work by Labour councillors throughout the land, who have worked tirelessly to provide decent, cheap, integrated public transport, has now been sacrificed on the altar of free enterprise.

The whole continent of Europe and practically all the developed world recognise and accept that the provision of a proper public transport system is a prerequisite for the foundations of a decent life for their citizens. Governments of the Left and Governments of the Right all over the developed world have continued to provide resources to build on and to enhance the provision of mass public transport. On the continent of Europe and elsewhere there has been a renaissance in the railway industry, but here in the United Kingdom our railway industry is subject to profit centre accounting, appalling failures in punctuality, the closure of railway workshops and totally unacceptable overcrowding of trains as a consequence of timetable changes.

In 1974, when the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties were formed, the passenger transport executive/passenger transport authority arrangements were agreed. We saw emerging from that structure a genuine attempt to integrate public transport in our large conurbations—the buses with the trains, the trains with the ferries — a strategy to reduce inter-modal competition, to provide travel cards, through-ticketing, concessionary fares for the elderly and schoolchildren, saver tickets, support for section 20 railway lines and the development of timetables after consultation with the general public, and, particularly in Labour-controlled areas, to stabilise and reduce fares, as a consequence of which ridership increased dramatically. We also saw, as a consequence of those policies, fundamental and noticeable improvements in the local environment. During that time, of course, we also saw the development and the coming to fruition of the Tyne and Wear metro — something of which the Opposition, at least, are extremely proud.

Those achievements have been possible because the metropolitan counties, the National Bus Company and the municipal operators have been able to use their expertise and the economies of scale that are available to them to respond flexibly to any given situation. Indeed, all these points were acknowledged—in my view properly—some years ago by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which had a report on several PTEs and several municipal operators.

So we asked the Secretary of State why he looked into the crystal ball when he could have read the book. Why embark upon a system of deregulation that would undermine years of transportation planning — planning which had the solid backing of the people in the metropolitan areas, as demonstrated time after time through the ballot box?

It was not just a partisan politician such as myself who was saying that. It was every user and every operator of public transport. Such diverse groups as Friends of the Earth, the women's institutes and Rural Voice were saying it. The Secretary of State's manic myopia was, to say the least, grossly insulting to the elected representatives, the professional transport planners and everyone else who opposed this piece of lunacy.

Regrettably, the GLC and the metropolitan counties have now gone out of existence. The joint boards are now having to deal with the provisions of the Transport Act 1985, and deregulation will become a reality in the autumn of this year. Some of the worst fears that I and my hon. Friends told the Secretary of State about during the long hours in Standing Committee are now beginning to be realised. I shall outline some of them and I hope that some of my hon. Friends will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that they can tell the House what is happening in their constituencies.

Mr. Adley: I should like to concentrate the hon. Gentleman's mind on the realities of life. Can he tell me which investment schemes British Rail is still awaiting decisions upon from the Government? Can he tell me of any year during which there was a Labour Government when a higher level of public money was invested in British Rail?

Mr. Stott: I acknowledge and respect the hon. Gentleman's interest in the railway industry. He is a stout defender of the industry and has tilted against many conventional windmills on the Government side of the House. I will leave the answer to his question to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). Perhaps he will answer it when he is winding up. One advantage of coming from Wigan is that one can play rugby well and can get rid of a ball quickly when necessary.

About 70 per cent. of routes have been registered under the Transport Act 1985 by the municipal operators—not the passenger transport executives. It is clear that few services will be provided after 8 pm and virtually no services will be provided on Sundays. In the county of Berkshire only Reading, which is served by its municipal transport company, will have services on Sunday and after 8 pm on weekdays from October. I am advised that in the rest of Berkshire there are no registered routes for those days.

Another example is the municipality of Kingston upon Hull. I am advised that it has registered 67 per cent. of its routes. I am also advised that the Labour council there will have to make some difficult decisions. As a consequence of the 1985 Act, it will have to make redundant 300 of its 810 employees. In addition, the local authority will have to meet the cost of the redundancies from its own resources, thus making it almost impossible to finance tendered services, the almost 40 per cent. of services that have not been registered. If the Government's lunacy comes to fruition, Kingston upon Hull will have fewer bus services in the city and another 300 people on the dole. So much for this brave new world.

From a questionnaire sent to its members by the Federation of Public Passenger Transport Employers about a whole host of issues, it appears that less than half the non-registered routes will not be put out to tender. Yesterday, the Secretary of State answered a question by his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). In a question about London the hon. Member asked:

> "Will my right hon. Friend congratulate LRT on the improved services that it has provided since it was established following its removal from the auspices of the GLC?"

The Secretary of State replied:

> "I shall certainly pass on my hon. Friend's congratulations to the chairman and board of LRT".—[Official Report, 21 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 6.]

The hon. Member for Ealing, North is not in the House. He made a statement to The Standard which was printed a little time before he put his question. The Standard reported:

> "Harry Greenway, Tory MP for Ealing North, says there are growing protests from people at the long wait at bus stops and at the general decline in service. He said: 'I am getting more and more complaints from people who claim they have to wait sometimes an hour for a bus. Such a delay is inexcusable.'"

That hon. Member said that to The Standard and then came here and congratulated his right hon. Friend about the way LRT was being run.

I should like to give some interesting figures from the constituency of Derbyshire, West. Today I was given a document produced by Mr. Keith Orford, the adviser and spokesman for the public transport unit at Matlock. He advises me:

> "North of Matlock the service to Bakewell via Winster will operate every hour, but the last departure from Matlock will be at 16.30. Only two buses a day will operate into Elton, and Stanton and Birchover will only be served on Mondays by service to/from Bakewell."

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he is talking about services that have been registered, or whether the county council has already taken a decision about exactly what other services it regards as socially necessary and for which it will invite tenders?

Mr. Stott: I am quoting from the document that Mr. Orford sent me this morning. To be fair to the Minister, I imagine that these are registered services and that other services are open to tender. It is that to which I should like to turn my attention. I suspect that the Secretary of State and his Department are proud of the number of services that have been registered to operate commercially from 26 October. They form about three quarters of the number of road service licences that currently exist. The impression is given that this means that 75 per cent. of existing journeys will be operated commercially.

When the Minister was pressed by me and by some of my hon. Friends, following parliamentary questions that we tabled some weeks ago about the current mileage undertaken by those operators and what mileage would be registered, he failed to give us a reply. He said the information was not available, yet every bus company, most local authorities and the traffic commissioners, for fuel duty rebate purposes, hold the necessary sources of information, and those sources could quickly have been processed by his Department. It is a disgrace that the Minister did not answer the question and told my hon. Friends that the information was not available.

Last year, my own council, Greater Manchester, said on page 68 of its TPP submission to the Minister that 72,070,000 miles were being run. That figure could have been made available by Ministers. It is now possible to tell the House the figures for registered services, those services that make a profit. In my area of greater Manchester, 64 per cent. of present service miles have been registered by the Greater Manchester Bus Company. An extra 4 per cent. have been registered by other operators, including National Bus Company subsidiaries, independents and even an occasional taxi driver.

We must bear in mind that, before the Transport Act 1985, some 96 per cent. of all services in greater Manchester were run by the PTE and only 4 per cent. by other operators. I suspect that that applied to every metropolitan authority. No doubt the Secretary of State will say that it is premature to judge what effect there will be on the services and that that cannot be done until the PTEs and the PTAs have gone out to tender and have decided upon services to fill the gaps left by operators promoting services commercially.

This raises the interesting question of how much money will be available to support those services. I shall take again the example of Greater Manchester PTE. Some months ago, it estimated that support to the tendered services would require at least £30 million a year. The best estimate at the moment is that the PTA should bank on having only £15 million from October onwards. Based on that, the director general of the Greater Manchester PTE estimated at a meeting last Friday that it would be possible to support only some 20 per cent. more services.

In other words, that would mean that, in the Greater Manchester area, from October onwards, some 10 to 12 per cent. of those bus services will not run.

There is a human price to pay for all that carnage. In my area—my hon. Friends will tell the House what is happening in theirs — 2,000 people in bus garages, administration and elsewhere will be made unemployed by the PTE in order that it should remain viable and profitable.

I hope the House will bear with me if I continue with the theme of financial chaos. I have referred to the problems of finance. Tenders are supposed to be let for supported bus services during the summer to start towards the end of October. It would not be unreasonable for a bus operator to expect a reasonable length of tender in order to cover the costs of establishing the new services, particularly if one of those operators is the new, thrusting, entrepreneurial, dynamic operator that the Secretary of State wants to see. Would not such an operator consider that for tendered services at least there should be some reasonable length of contract? In order to meet that, would it not be reasonable for the PTA to expect that it should have some idea of the likely levels of expenditure over, say, the next two years so that it may decide how many tendered services can go out this year, next year and the year after? Not a bit of it.

The PTA in Greater Manchester has been writing to the Department of Transport since before Christmas in an attempt to find out the likely level of expenditure which it will be allowed by the Secretary of State for 1987-88. On 6 January, one of the Secretary of State's civil servants replied to the effect that he was surprised that the PTA wanted to know that figure. The same civil servant relented somewhat in March because he then accepted that the authority did have a right to know, but he restated the Government's position. The only advice that he could give my authority was that given in 1984 — that planning should be on the assumption that revenue support expenditure should be reduced by 25 to 30 per cent. over the next three years. That leaves the PTEs and the PTAs, and no doubt the municipal authorities, still guessing as to what will be the likely levels of expenditure next year and the year after.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): The hon. Gentleman is right to support his case with illustrations from his area, which he knows well, but is it fair that, for example, Lancashire, which I believe is his county, has a transport subsidy per head of population of £13, while Greater Manchester, whose case he is using to illustrate his point, has a subsidy per head of population of £30? That simply does not make sense to the rest of the country.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman and I shared many happy hours on the Bill in Committee but I think that he has hold of the wrong end of the stick. I was talking about the information coming from the Department of Transport to give PTEs and municipal operators some idea of the likely level of revenue support from that Department and elsewhere.

Let me take the hon. Gentleman a step further. I do not know whether he was here, but a few months ago the Secretary of State pushed through an order setting the maximum precept limit, which he unwisely referred to as putting the stopper on the amount of public money spent on providing public transport in the metropolitan areas. It is some stopper; in every PTA area the precept has gone up because authorities have had to pay for the cost of deregulation and they have had to foot the bill for the nonsensical Government grant policy.

Let me tell the House the cost to authorities such as mine, South Yorkshire, West Yorkshire and others of deregulation, of the needless expense of making bus workers redundant, of the waste of assets that will be mothballed or sold off below book value, of the bureaucratic exercise involved in forming new companies and transferring assets around the place, of dismantling the existing systems based on co-operation and replacing them with ones where only profits count. As for grant policies, the Secretary of State for Transport sets one limit for expenditure, while the Secretary of State for the Environment, independently and arbitrarily, bases his rate support grant on altogether different and even less meaningfull formula. The PTAs are then penalised by the Secretary of State for the Environment because they have the temerity to spend up to the levels that the Secretary of State says they can. That is reflected in a higher rate of precept in all the county council areas.

Let me give some examples. The rate is higher by approximately 40 per cent. in Greater Manchester than it need be. The rate is higher by 82 per cent. in Merseyside, 82 per cent. in South Yorkshire, 17 per cent. in Tyne and Wear, 28 per cent. in the West Midlands and 59 per cent. in West Yorkshire. The result of the Secretary of State's stopper is that the PTAs are forced by the Government to levy higher rates to pay for the Government's own policies, which will mean worse services.

The Transport Act 1985 removes passenger transport from the long-held status of a strategic national industry and relegates it to a use-it-or-lose-it activity. If current Government thinking is correct, the rest of the developed world is incorrect. No other Government in the developed world are prepared to subject the business of moving millions of people every day of the week to the inconsistencies of market forces.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): I believe that I heard the hon. Gentleman say that no other country in the developed world would do that. What is happening in Japan, which is privatising the whole railway system and has already privatised the underground system?

Mr. Stott: Privatisation is different. We are talking about deregulation. No other country in the world is embarking upon leaving the mass movement of people to the vagaries of the free market. They all recognise the sense of a regulated transport system.

Until the Transport Act 1985, the United Kingdom was beginning to catch up with the rest of the world in the provision of mass transit systems. Unfortunately, some areas of Britain had a woefully inadequate transport provision, but overall we were beginning to get it right. We were beginning to set in hand plans for mass transit systems that would take us into the next century, building on the successes of the Tyne and Wear metro and the many and varied innovations that have been pioneered by the GLC, the NBC and the PTAs.

But along came old Nick, dragging the rotting corpse of Adam Smith behind him and eulogising those burnt-out ideas whose time has been and gone. The Secretary of State has been tearing down the safety net of social provision and replacing it with the vagaries of the free market.

One of the most emancipating elements in the lives of ordinary people is the ability to be mobile. The provision of a regulated, integrated, inexpensive public transport system has the support of millions of British people. They may not be completely wedded to Socialism, but the vast majority of them care about and will vote for and demand fairness for all, not a free-for-all. That is where the Government have made their biggest mistake. Public transport cannot be auctioned off in the market place. Public transport is an integral and necessary part of the nation's social provision.

For most of the country, Sunday 26 October will be the day that the clocks are put back one hour. For the bus industry and its passengers it will be the day that the Secretary of State turns back the clock 56 years. British summer time ends on 26 October. The public transport winter replaces it. [Laughter.] If hon. Gentlemen opposite are laughing about that, I have to tell them that on 8 May this year the people of the United Kingdom, when they vote in the municipal elections, will give the Secretary of State the biggest trampling that he has ever had.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'congratulates the Government on its radical approach to the long standing problems of public transport, its determination to obtain value for money and its introduction of policies of competition and deregulation for the benefit of the passenger which are based upon choice, freedom and fairness to improve the quality of life for the whole community and particularly for those who depend entirely upon public transport.'.

That was an extraordinary outburst from the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). I suppose that it is part of the new caring initiative that we have read about in the Financial Times. If so, I advise the hon. Gentleman to try again. It was not very good. His motion speaks of the crisis in public transport. I agree with the Opposition that there has indeed been a crisis with a reduction in services and higher fares, and subsidies spiralling out of control. Subsidies rose from £269 million in 1974 to £558 million in 1984, at constant 1984 prices, and over the same period services fell by 12 per cent. The crisis was the result of years of regulation, restriction, integration and socialism, and what I can now only call Stottism.

We are putting in place the solution of deregulation, competition and privatisation. We are setting operators free to provide the services that customers want. Competition makes operators efficient and makes them provide passengers with the quality of service they want. So I am glad to be able to tell the House that the crisis is ending.

Let us look at what has happened. First, London Regional Transport. There is no crisis here. The improvement in efficiency and in service to the public is truly remarkable. I remember that when the London Regional Transport Bill was being debated, the Bill's critics went on about fares rising 20 per cent. above the rate of inflation, 33 tube stations closing, 34 bus routes being withdrawn—remember the advertisement "Come in No. 9, your time is up"?—and concessionary fares coming to an end. I wonder how they dare return to this subject this evening. The hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) do not dare come to the House. They are not here, and I do not wonder about that either.

Fares have not gone above inflation, no tube stations have been shut, and bus mileage was trimmed by a tiny 2 per cent. to match supply with demand. The No. 9 still runs. The present level of service will be maintained, as the decline in bus patronage has now been arrested. Londoners still enjoy concessionary fares.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Will the Secretary of State explain to the House why, when the London Regional Transport Bill was in Committee, he included a clause providing concessionary passes for pensioners in London, but refused to put a similar section in the Transport Act 1985 which would have safeguarded concessionary passes for pensioners throughout the country?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman now knows that that clause was not necessary, because the boroughs have since come together to provide slightly better schemes than were provided by the GLC.

My predictions of possible cost savings, which were pooh-poohed by the Opposition, were, I fear, wrong. The late unlamented GLC proposed to increase revenue subsidy for London Transport from the £190 million that it had planned for 1984-85 to £245 million by 1987-88. These enormous sums would have had to be found by the ratepayers and taxpayers on top of the cost of capital, which is provided as a grant to London Regional Transport, not a loan. The House will want to hear these figures.

LRT's performance has shown that subsidies at these levels are not necessary. I set Dr. Bright and his colleagues tough managerial objectives. Unit costs were to be reduced each year by at least 2·5 per cent. in real terms, fares were to be stable in real terms, investment in the system was to be increased, and revenue subsidies were to be halved in three years so that they would be no more than £95 million by 1987-88. In every respect LRT has hit or beaten my targets. LRT has published an estimate of its revenue deficit for 1985-86. At £109 million it is a remarkable £81 million less than the GLC's plans for the previous year —an enormous saving. For the present financial year, 1986-87, the estimated deficit falls still further to £79 million, which is about £150 million less revenue for ratepayers and taxpayers to find.

These figures are not the product of creative accounting, a concept which I prefer to leave to the GLC. They result from a continuing and relentless attack on waste and inefficiency. That will continue to lift the burden from the shoulders of ratepayers and taxpayers. We may soon see the total elimination of revenue subsidy in London, if London Regional Transport continues as it has begun. This would mean a saving of £245 million a year for Londoners compared to the GLC's plans. Those are dramatic figures, and they demonstrate the total hollowness of the Opposition's arguments against the London Regional Transport Act 1984.

The grant for capital investment has increased from £150 million for 1984-85 to £216 million in the current year. We invest in the future; the GLC subsidised the past. We are seeing the rapid development of an efficient and attractive public transport system in London. I stress the word "attractive". Patronage is booming, the Underground had its busiest year ever last year and services are being increased by 3 per cent. The long-run decline in bus travel is halting. Contrary to what was alleged yesterday at Question Time, the waiting times and the speed and performance of London's buses are the same as they have been for the last three years. No cuts overall are planned in the service but London Regional Transport is quite rightly systematically changing the pattern of services to meet what people actually want. To speak of a crisis in London's public transport is to turn the English language on its head. The fact that LRT is doing so well shows what a determined management can do when faced with a challenge. The next step is for London buses to face the rigours, and the stimulus, of bus deregulation in London. That is the best way to ensure lasting reductions in subsidy and improvements in services.

Next, long-distance coaches. Again, there is no crisis here. Hundreds of new services have started—over 900 have started and 700 of those are still in business—since the deregulation of long-distance express coaches. The number of passengers carried on the NBC's national express services has increased by about 50 per cent.

Fares have been reduced in real terms. On some important routes, notably London to Exeter and London to Newcastle, they are lower in cash terms now than they were six years ago.

Equally striking is the improved quality of coach services—the national express rapide services and the numerous luxury commuter services bear elegant witness to that. Passengers have made it clear that they want quality and are prepared to pay for it—in a deregulated industry, operators provide the kind of service that passengers want.

Then railways. For the longer distance there is now competition between rail, air, coach and car. Inter-city is gradually "getting there". We have worked to ensure that it becomes both unsubsidised and competitive. The impact of competition has already brought benefits to rail travellers. Attractive cheap fare offers have been developed. High quality executive Pullman services are offering new standards of service. Contracting out is going to lead to higher standards of catering and cleaning. Inter-city is able to plan for new rolling stock within its financial resources. Electrification of services to Norwich will soon be completed. The east coast main line electrification, the biggest railway investment project for 25 years, is now under way.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Many of us agree that inter-city services are excellent, but what about those clapped-out diesel engines that are often used on inter-city services from various stations, such as York, Peterborough and Edinburgh? Those of us who use inter-city services a lot know that British Rail has a heck of a problem with those diesels that are rather ancient. Can the Secretary of State say anything about investment plans?

Mr. Ridley: I am happy to assure the hon. Gentleman that we are catching up with the appalling neglect and backlog of under-investment under the last Labour Administration. In a moment I shall have something to say about investment in railways, when I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman's point.

I admit that there are many railway services that will always run at a loss and require Government support. The public service obligation grant for this year is about £830 million. Even here there has been a remarkable turnround in value for money. Over the past three years British Rail has been able to reduce its dependence on PSO grant by 25 per cent. Over £250 million at today's prices has been cut off the bill to the taxpayers. That has not been done by closures, which would deprive communities of rail services, as Opposition scaremongers are always trying to make out. It has been done by effective management to improve efficiency.

I pay tribute, as I hope Opposition Members will, to Sir Robert Reid and his board for what they have achieved. Contrary to the popular myth, this success has not led to a fall in the standard of the services offered. The chairman told the Select Committee on Transport two weeks ago that the financial targets need not undermine, and have not undermined, the quality of service on the railway.

Mr. Stott: If that is the case, can the Minister explain what I know from personal experience? I get the train from Wigan to London every week. This year, apart from two occasions, that train has been woefully bad at time keeping. If the Secretary of State were to catch a train and to walk into a second-class compartment, he would find it heaving with people. People have to stand almost all the way from Wigan to Westminster. That is a consequence of British Rail policy. That is what people have to put up with.

Mr. Ridley: One of the worst features of some hon. Gentlemen, including the hon. Member for Wigan, is the use of their personal travelling experiences to make a general case.

Mr. Stott: When does the Secretary of State travel? What is his experience?

Mr. Ridley: As a frequent train traveller, I have had experiences which have been just as unfortunate as those of other hon. Gentlemen. I keep them to myself and do not direct them into public complaints, as the hon. Gentleman has sought to do.

I accept that there are areas where the board is not yet achieving its quality targets. That concedes the hon. Gentleman's point to some extent. We shall ask British Rail to look for improvements for the travelling public. For example, punctuality still needs to be improved. Improvements in quality are important. I shall be discussing with the chairman of the board what needs to be done as we work towards agreeing objectives for the next few years.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. Friend not pleased to note that we have now reached a situation where he, as a Conservative Minister, is congratulating a nationalised industry, and the Labour party, which is supposed to support nationalised industry, can do nothing but knock it?

Mr. Ridley: I hope that Opposition Members soon will be pressing for the privatisation of the railways.

Improved efficiency on the railways has made it possible to authorise an increasing level of investment, which is the answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). British Rail plans to spend over £2 billion over the next five years, more than half of which is already authorised. What better demonstration could there be that improved costs and efficiency are the way to the high-quality, modern railway that we want? So there is no crisis there either.

The hon. Member for Wigan was less than fair to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) in passing to him the poisoned chalice. The hon. Member for Aberdeen will not be able to answer. If he likes, I shall give him a note of the answer.

Next, buses, where Opposition hopes of a crisis are looking dimmer every day. The first of the benefits of deregulation and competition, which the Transport Act has brought, are already to be seen in many towns where the National Bus Company has introduced minibuses. At the beginning of 1984, as a response to the new policy, the NBC introduced a fleet of minibuses into Exeter to provide a flexible, high frequency service. In the first year alone it reported a 60 per cent. increase in passenger traffic on the same routes, with the minibuses carrying some people who had previously used cars. Loss was turned to profit and more people were employed. Now I believe that patronage has increased by nearly three times.

Minibuses for Exeter led the way. There are now about 1,000 in Worcester, Cheltenham, Oxford, Norwich, Leicester and many other towns, and I understand that they are coming into London soon. The list is growing all the time as more and more NBC subsidiaries see the scope for serving passengers and turning losses into profit.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I was told today that there will be an estimated 19,000 redundancies in the National Bus Company. Is that fact or fiction?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. There have been 20,000 redundancies in the National Bus Company over the past 10 years. That is what the hon. Gentleman must be thinking of. That is the problem with which we seek to deal.

The success of minibuses shows the scope for the bus industry to operate profitably and to expand. It proves that there is room for innovation and that passengers can be tempted away from other forms of transport. The Transport Act gives all operators, not just the NBC, the incentive to examine their services, to find out what passengers want and to provide it. If they do not, a competitor will.

The implementation of the Act has started well, despite the hopes of Opposition Members. Alarmists and irresponsible people like the hon. Member for Wigan have been up to their usual scaremongering tactics. In the last few weeks they have put about claims that bus services will be drastically reduced because they have not all been registered. The hon. Gentleman was at it again this evening. In fact, by the end of February, some 15,000 commercial services had been registered, representing about 75 per cent. of the existing network. The hon. Gentleman said it was 68 per cent. for Manchester. It is a revelation that 75 per cent. of the services have been registered, because nearly all those services were being subsidised previously. Now it turns out that those services did not need subsidy. Is that not another astonishing result that has come already from the Transport Act?

The most irresponsible lie is that those registered commercial services are the end of the story. The hon. Gentleman was trying to say so again this evening. When he was challenged by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, he admitted that that was not what he had meant. He had left out the vital part which makes it clear that other services will run after deregulation. Local authorities have both the power and the money to subsidise those additional services which they believe will be necessary to meet local needs. This scare, too, is typical of the Labour party. We saw it with coaches, with LRT and with concessionary fares.

The decision about which local services to subsidise is, as the House knows, for local authorities. We have increased the provision for local public transport support outside London from £247 million in the last financial year to £273 million in 1986-87. That is an increase of 10 per cent.—substantially more than the rate of inflation. So there is more money than there was last year. The consequences are reflected in the local authority rate support grant totals.

The Opposition keep suggesting that the new passenger transport authorities will not have adequate resources for public transport subsidies. The hon. Member for Wigan was at it again today. Let me give him some figures. Let us take South Yorkshire as an example. Public transport subsidy in 1986-87, after redetermination, will still be about £40 per head. That may be a reduction of one third on last year's figures, but it is still far in excess of the amounts of subsidy paid in the shires, which averaged about £5 per head last year, and were below £2 in Somerset. Are we seriously asked to believe that an authority spending £40 for every man, woman and child in its area, cannot fill the gaps in its public transport operation? If authorities cannot provide the necessary socially desirable services with that kind of money, something is wrong with them. Talk of massive cuts in local services is, quite frankly, rubbish.

Public transport subsidy — excluding redundancy payments — in the metropolitan districts next year is likely to average about £30 per head compared to a figure of about £5 in the shires. That suggests that there is considerable scope for further cuts in future, reducing the heavy burden on ratepayers, which I am conscious still remains, and to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Finally, on the question of concessionary fares, we were told when the Bill was going through that it would be the end of concessionary fares as we know them, passes would be replaced by tokens, and authorities would find it impossible to administer schemes applying to all the operators who would be providing the services once deregulation had set them free. This further campaign of scaremongering was intended to play upon the fears of the most vulnerable people in the community—the old and the handicapped.

In fact, many county councils have announced plans for schemes applying to the whole of their area. They include Essex, Kent and Lancashire — three of the largest counties in the country. I understand that in Lancashire the scheme will cover all the eight districts in the county which have their own transport companies. Similarly Derbyshire, where considerable doubts were expressed about the effects of deregulation on concessionary fares, has now announced a scheme for half-fare passes covering the whole of the county area. We said that the Bill would give authorities flexibility to make suitable arrangements, and we have been proved right. We have also made allowances for the changes introduced by the Act by the increase of 13 per cent. in provision for expenditure on this item.

In the metropolitan counties, we were told that existing schemes would collapse with abolition. But we took full account of the cost of existing concessionary fare schemes in setting maximum precept levels. In the event, five out of the six joint boards in England have maintained their schemes for elderly and disabled people practically unchanged. The sixth—South Yorkshire—has decided to introduce a small standing fare of 5p per journey.

In London, as I predicted, the boroughs have agreed to continue the existing arrangements for concessionary travel in 1986-87 without resort to the statutory reserve scheme. I think that the scares about travel concessions were particularly mean and many old people have been unnecessarily worried. These fears were groundless, deliberate and mischievous, and I hope that the Opposition will suffer grievously from peddling such rubbish.

To sum all this up, service has improved on coach, rail, underground and bus. Fares have been held at their real value, and in some cases reduced. Concessionary fare schemes have been maintained. The annual savings to the public purse from reduced revenue subsidies to London Regional Transport and BR are already about £350 million — with more to come in the future, including a contribution from buses. This has enabled increased investment to take place in the public transport industries. I am proud of this record.

The only crisis that we witness today is the crisis of a Labour party which has no new ideas, as the hon. Gentleman amply demonstrated in his speech.

I regard the Opposition motion as impertinent, and I ask the House to pass the amendment and to reject the motion with contumely.

8.4 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I think that the Secretary of State has some justification for his remarks on British Rail. He was however, pretty selective in his statistics relating to London Regional Transport, to which I shall return later.

It is a tragedy for the country that our public transport policies have become so politically controversial. It is therefore important that the Select Committee on Transport—I note that at least two, and perhaps three members of the Committee, of which I am a member, are present in the Chamber — should try to find some common ground as it undertakes its current investigation into the financing of the public transport services. So far we have been examining the railways and interrogating members of the British Railways Board and departmental officials. We are also looking at new developments, including the so-called Pacer and Sprinter trains, tomorrow morning.

My current view is that, slowly and surely, the railways are getting themselves out of the mire. The coal strike was of course a major setback. Permission for new capital programmes such as the east coast main line, Bournemouth-Weymouth, East Anglia, and Hastings has been forthcoming, and we have to say that correctly and truthfully.

Many of our stations, particularly the London terminals are becoming what they always should have been, busy, clean and quite exciting places providing some excellent facilities. One has only to look at Victoria or Waterloo to see what changes have taken place. I think that it is absolutely tragic that that lovely station at Great Malvern, which has just been done up, should have been damaged by fire the other day. British Rail is looking at some of its masterpieces, and that is one of them.

A promise has also been given in the House that extra capital resources will be made available to the railways to take proper advantage of the Channel tunnel development. This should provide a massive stimulus for the railway network if enthusiastically pursued.

I was in Fort William the other day and had the wonderful experience of seeing the integrated system whereby the Wiggins Teape mill is sending its paper by rail from Fort William to arrive south of London next morning. Wiggins Teape exports to the Common Market and it could take advantage of the arrangement by sending its paper to Italy or to Austria. But it is when we compare our standards with those of our Common Market neighbours that we realise how far still our railways have to go. New rolling stock is desperately needed, particularly on the southern region. What will happen—perhaps the Minister will deal with this—if British Rail Engineering Ltd. abandons Eastleigh, as is now rumoured? Surely we need to sustain a major railway workshop in the south.

Sir Robert Reid's article in The House Magazine, and his evidence to the Select Committee, were optimistic. Despite the continuing high levels of investment that is needed, he feels he can keep within the tough PSO limits. It is true that productivity has risen, as has passenger volume, and for this achievement I bow to management and unions. I think that both are to be congratulated. They have shown common sense, the results of which are now beginning to be revealed.

I should like to see a moratorium on all closures for at least three years, and a continuing exploitation of the capital assets of the railways. With regard to the stations, for instance, much more can be done and more thought could be given to streamlining ticketing. It is at that point that delays occur which lead to people occasionally missing trains.

I oppose the possible loss of the Settle-Carlisle line, England's most dramatic railway. British Rail itself has shown that it is possible to make a line profitable if one exploits the scenic beauty. In this case, it has made a profit of £1 million. There is surely a case for a heritage grant to restore and maintain the line.

I would want reconsideration of the closure of Marylebone station, which is now regularly used for steam excursions to Stratford-on-Avon and elsewhere. We urgently require a new coach station in north London, but why must it Marylebone?

Much improved rail links are needed to our principal airports. This comes high on my list. More and faster inter-city cross-country trains are also needed. There is a need for the link between the Midland and Southern via Snow hill to be rapidly built. I want to see the docklands light railway integrated with the Waterloo and City line.

I would like to see a moving belt for heavy luggage at certain stations. Why cannot we do what the Danes do? I saw such a belt when the Select Committee visited Ejsborg recently. At Portsmouth harbour, moving belts on the platform to take luggage down on to the boats would help elderly people with their cases. Such facilities would improve people's travelling.

We also want a more forthcoming and helpful work force. That is happening. Trains on the Portsmouth line do not now shut their buffet cars at Haslemere; they are open all the way to Portsmouth, which is encouraging. People are talking to us and saying nice things over the radio. Things are beginning to happen, so let us keep that up, but we also want flexibility from the Government.

However, I do not take the same rosy view of the bus industry as does the Secretary of State—to me its future is bleak. It is clear that a substantial number of rural routes may disappear or require high subsidies if they are to remain open. Surely this exercise, which has totally missed out, was to encourage the entrepreneurs to register routes. Where are they? They have not appeared.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Oh yes they have.

Mr. Ross: There are three in my constituency, and I can tell the House exactly who they are.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: The Wyre borough has a very imaginative scheme, including school buses and taxis. It will work very well in the rural areas.

Mr. Ross: We have heard that in Manchester the figure is 4 per cent. outside of the National Bus Company. It is less than that in my constituency. Two of the routes registered are exactly what we expected—one a taxi company that will run hourly on the most profitable routes, and the other a coach company that will run its coaches two minutes before the NBC runs its buses.

One scheme that I very much welcome is from a hotel that will run a minibus service to a railway station. For years I have been trying to persuade the bus company to do that, and it is now thinking of doing so. However, that is the only good thing to have come out of the exercise.

We have been given some statistics already. I understand that in Clwyd 65 per cent. of routes have been registered, while in Gwynedd the figure is 60 per cent. In my part of the world 85 per cent. have been registered, but there is little competition. Where is it? I do not want to tread on the ground of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), but I understand that Manchester will have a shortfall of at least £10 million, and perhaps even £15 million, to cover the services that will now have to be subsidised due to other expenses falling upon it. It will also have some competition on the Glossop-Manchester line, where a bus service has been registered. In Ryedale and West Derby some rural services may disappear.

I have to tell the Secretary of State that many of the minibuses appeared not after the 1985 Act, but before it—largely because of the withdrawal of the bus grants. That is why, at long last, other methods of transporting people are being considered, and I welcome that. It is too early to say with any certainty how it will all pan out in the end. The traffic commissioners are inundated with work, and some of the documentation is faulty. It is becoming obvious that there will be future problems with the Act.

The Secretary of State gave certain assurances that management-worker buy-out schemes would be given priority, but it now appears that they may not have that opportunity. I want to question the right hon. Gentleman on that issue while I have the opportunity. Will he give management-work force bids priority? In early press releases he said that he was hoping that such bids would come forward, and indicated that they would be considered sympathetically. Do they now have to compete with open market bids?

We have suffered under Sealink, and I do not want the bus company in the Isle of Wight bought by the same gentleman because that would be an absolute disaster. There would be a total monopoly. I know that the management and work force have put in a bid, and I hope that they will be given every opportunity to succeed. After all, the Secretary of State has strongly indicated that such bids would be sympathetically considered, but it now appears that they will have to compete with bids from the private sector. It could be that some will miss out, which would be disastrous for constituencies such as mine.

[Mr. Ross]

If bus subsidiaries fall into the wrong hands, that could create monopolies, and the Secretary of State must protect us against that. It is tragic that by his total commitment to market forces, fine systems like the Tyne and Wear metro are put at risk——

Mr. Ridley: No, it is not.

Mr. Ross: Of course it is put at risk.

Cross-country timetabling on buses will become almost impossible. I can go into my local inquiry office and find out how to go to Bournemouth and then on to Dorchester on a bus. That will not happen in future because no one will know what services are running. Travel cards and through ticketing will be highly unlikely. I have experience of that—I am still arguing with British Rail and Sealink. They withdrew the concessions for the disabled, the forces and students. They have returned the concession to the disabled, but not to the others. That hurts in my constituency. At the end of the day, the local authorities will take all the blame if the routes do not run. That is what always happens.

The Secretary of State has a great deal of personal responsibility in London. I travel by bus every day, and frequently travel on the underground. Returns may be marginally higher, but the service has certainly deteriorated. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a 30p ticket on the 507 bus has risen to 40p—a 30 per cent. increase? That is far more than the rate of inflation. Some underground lines are no longer running as far as they used to run—for example, those to Uxbridge in peak periods. The Bakerloo line is cutting back all the time.

The only good news of late is that Westminster city council has decided to keep most of its bus lanes, despite all the criticism from another place. I am sure that it is right to do so. All the buses seem to be for sightseeing tours; too few of them pick up passengers at the bus stops, so there are long queues. Quite frankly, the criticisms of the bus lanes are wholly wrong.

I find it difficult to support either the motion or the amendment. I cannot support the Labour motion, but then I cannot support the Government amendment either. I tabled an amendment but it was not called. However, I believe that my amendment is nearer right than wrong, and that it will be proved right at the end of the day.

8.16 pm

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): I have listened to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) during other debates. I had the fortune, or perhaps misfortune, to listen to him on many occasions during the debates on the Telecommunications Bill, so his scaremongering this evening came as no surprise to me. During the proceedings on that Bill we were told that it would lead to no public telephone boxes, no rural services, no services for the disabled, no directory facilities, and so on. Wat has happened? Two years after the Bill was enacted, we have all those services, and most of them have improved. It therefore came as no surprise to listen to yet another torrent of scaremongering tonight—it has happened over and over again in transport debates.

It was significant that the hon. Member for Wigan made reference to no other form of transport than buses. He made no reference to coaches, to railways, or to any modern developments such as the docklands railway. Why not? It is because during the past two, three or four years, Opposition Members have persistently set about using scaremongering tactics. As each piece of legislation has passed through the House, we have been told that services would disappear. At every Third Reading we are told that either long-distance coaches, London transport, or any service one chooses to mention will disappear. What is the truth? Anyone travelling on the M4 knows that he can hardly move in the inside or second lanes because of the number of coaches. Such services take a fair amount of time to develop. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) may say that they are not there now, but people have to develop the expertise. The entrepreneurs do not spring up immediately; it takes time. That is precisely what has happened to the coach services.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State quoted costs for the ordinary passenger. People now have an alternative. It is no longer a case of take British Rail or leave it and do not come to London. People regularly use coach services because they prefer them. That pressure is applied to British Rail, and I welcome the improvement in its services as a result. It is now recognising that passengers have an alternative.

When I first entered the House, there were scaremongering stories about the Serpell report. There have been three speeches in the debate so far, but no reference to the Serpell report, yet in 1983 it was the talk of the Opposition Benches. It was another general election scare.

I also disagree with the hon. Member for Isle of Wight about services in London. If they are deteriorating as he suggests, why are more and more people using the underground and buses? That is happening, despite the fact that inner London has a progressively declining—and in some areas a rapidly declining—population. All the population statistics show that there should be a progressively diminishing use of bus and underground services. However, the long-term decline on the buses has been halted and the number of people using the underground has risen.

Is it not significant that there is only one London Member in the Chamber this evening? Surely, if, as has been predicted so often in debates, this Government's schemes would be a disaster for London Regional Transport, Labour Members would be lining up to cite examples of complaints about the No. 12 bus, the underground services to Cockfosters or the west end of London, or services anywhere else. Instead, such examples are notably absent.

It is really amazing that the scaremongering tactics continue. This evening we have heard that the next case will be that of buses. People genuinely fear the future and change, but change need not necessarily be revolutionary: it can be evolutionary.

Reference has been made to minibus services.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I represent a constituency in South Yorkshire, as the hon. Gentleman knows. Earlier, we heard the Minister talking nonsense. After the introduction of our policy, which he criticised, the votes increased at every election. I ask the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) about private ownership. Hon. Members talk about private ownership of transport as though it is new. The municipalisation of transport came about because of the total failure of private ownership of the railways, buses, trams and so on. Therefore, there is nothing new about privatisation; it is an old idea and it has failed.

Mr. Hayward: I am pleased to say that I am not aware that any hon. Member's children were educated by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), because he has an interesting interpretation of history. The decision to nationalise British Rail and municipalise the bus services immediately after the war stems from a political viewpoint with which I happen to disagree and with which he agrees. The decision resulted not from complete failure one way or the other, but from a difference of political viewpoint and should not be interpreted otherwise.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Wigan has left the Chamber, because I wish to refer to developments in Avon, an area he knows well. Reference has already been made to minibus services. There were previously extremely few minibus services around the country; they could almost be counted on the fingers of one hand. Under the catalyst of the recently passed Transport Act, we have seen the blossoming of such services throughout the country.

Mr. Flannery: Where?

Mr. Hayward: In Bristol, in the county of Avon—to the extent that the evening newspaper the other day carried a full page article under the headline, "Bullseye! Bus is on target". What a change for a headline to say that a bus service is on time. The reason is that minibuses have been introduced throughout Bristol.

The article states:

"The fleet started operating in February and the City Line bus company soon declared them a success, with a 20 per cent. increase in passengers recorded."

That has happened in only two months. The buses are serving roads which in my constituency have never had a bus service. Pensioners, who were being frightened by Labour party spokesmen, can now get on and off buses outside their own doors. Previously they had to walk a quarter of a mile or half a mile to get on a large, almost immovable, double decker service, which could not go down the side streets. Now pensioners are lauding the service over and over again. The sub-heading to the article is: "Have a good day? We certainly did". The article is written not by bus operators or Tory Central Office but by the reporters from the Bristol Evening Post who travelled on the buses.

Another such article states:

"As we got off the bus, three people refused to get on as it would have meant standing. But they were happy to wait on the stop, confident in the knowledge that another would be along in a minute."

When was something like that last written by a reporter about any municipal bus service or rail service? That is the sort of change that has taken place in my area and other areas of the country.

Mr. Ridley: I was told by the National Bus Company that it was the prospect of the ending of network subsidy that made it conclude that it was necessary in the first place to try minibuses.

Mr. Hayward: I thank my right hon. Friend for that information. I referred to it as a catalyst. There is no doubt that it acted as a substantial catalyst to move bus companies to provide a service that people want to and do use.

What I also find depressing about the speech of the hon. Member for Wigan is that he did not refer to future investment. He said nothing about the docklands light railway or developments in terms of future services, electrification or improvement in rolling stock on British Rail. I support very strongly the development of the docklands light railway, as it is a long-overdue innovation. It will afford the opportunity for large numbers of jobs to be created in an area of London that currently has high unemployment. I want to put on record my hope that the City of London corporation does not oppose the light railway to the point where it becomes impossible to develop. Such a development will be to the benefit of the people in that area, in terms not only of employment but of transport.

I believe that the public transport services in this country are not adequate at present but they are improving. Over the past few years, substantial changes have taken place. I welcome them, as I believe that the public generally welcome them, which is why people increasingly use these services.

8.26 pm

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): Last year, according to Ministers and supporters, the 1985 Transport Act would lead to lower fares, better services and many more jobs being created. Many Labour Members took a vastly different view. In fairness, at this time, it is still as difficult as ever to state with absolute certainty what the final outcome of the Act will be. However, I believe that some chickens have come home to roost when it comes to jobs.

I accept that in the short term in many areas there will be lower fares and better services, but only in the short term. That situation will not last long. After the initial battles have been fought and won there will be a return to the present fares level, and perhaps even higher fares. Many services will disappear or will be drastically curtailed, and frequencies will be substantially reduced so that the companies will be able to stay in business.

I declare an interest as a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers' Union. I will confine most of what I say to the Scottish situation, with special emphasis on the Strathclyde region and Glasgow.

Earlier this month my hon. Friends the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland and for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and myself met the directors of Strathclyde passenger transport executive to discuss the transport situation in the region and in the city of Glasgow. It is perfectly clear that tremendous problems confront the PTE as a result of the 1985 Act. Because of this the travelling public of Strathclyde, which has half of Scotland's population, will also face tremendous problems.

Present financial support from Strathclyde regional council for bus services operated by the PTE is about £8 million per annum, yet the 1985 Act requires the newly formed company to be viable year by year and only allows for the company to be funded on one occasion after reconstitution, with approval having to be given by the Secretary of State. Any further loss in any given year could give rise to the company being put into receivership. Presumably if that ever happened it would be swallowed up for a song by some asset-stripping entrepreneur. Even more restrictive is the fact that any proposal to the Secretary of State showing a predicted loss will be rejected out of hand, and the new company will not be allowed to commence trading.

[Mr. David Marshall]

The tremendous problem facing the PTE as a result of all this is perhaps best illustrated by stating that £1 million represents the average wage of approximately 100 employees or 2 million passengers carried for a 50p fare. If those figures are multiplied by eight, one can see the full horror of the scenario now facing Strathclyde PTE. Given the short amount of time available for the submission of a business plan, the end result has been the submission of a plan that means the closure of two garages—leaving only four garages in Glasgow—and the prospect of 574 redundancies in August and September. That is just for starters in an area that already has unacceptably high unemployment.

A breakdown of those redundancies shows that 113 redundancies will be made in management and administration, 18 among engineering supervisors, 30 among inspectors, 171 among traffic staff, 125 among craftsmen, 84 among manual workers and 33 others. That represents a reduction in the number of employees from 3,247 to 2,673. Thus, 574 jobs are being thrown down the drain for no good reason. Where are most of those good people going to find jobs, particularly in Scotland? There is nowhere for them to go and there are no jobs for them to find. They have just been thrown on the scrapheap.

One of the most objectionable aspects of the Act is that Strathclyde PTE and the other municipal operators in Scotland — in Grampian, Lothian and Tayside — are apparently being set up with a substantial compulsory form of debt, in order to prevent unfair competition with small operators. But as far as I am aware no such strictures are being imposed on the Scottish Bus Group. Yet compared with it, the PTE and others are very small. The PTE will operate about 560 peak-hour buses as against about 3,000 operated by the Scottish Bus Group. The bus group is really 11 separate companies, yet it is collectively one operator as far as competitive legislation is concerned. It will be able to have common ticketing, co-ordinated fares and other things that other companies will not be able to have. In addition, it has the tremendous advantage of having built up very substantial resources over the years, which it will be able to use to wage a low fares policy in an attempt to eliminate or take over its competitors' services.

It is significant that the National Bus Company in England has not been given similar advantages, as far as I am aware, over its competitors. Why has the Scottish Bus Group been treated so favourably compared with every other operator in Scotland and England? The intention is simple. It is that the bus group should be able to gobble up as much as it can of Scotland's bus services. In a year or two it will then be privatised and sold off by the Government.

Another nauseous aspect of the Act is its affect on employees, and in particular on their pensions. It is true, as Ministers said at the time, that existing employees may have their pensions protected. For example, Strathclyde PTE has made an application for admission to the local government superannuation scheme. But the business plan that has been prepared and submitted states that the preferred option for new employees is for a new superannuation scheme, which is extremely unlikely to be capable of providing similar benefits. What a way to treat workers who will be doing the same job of work side by side, but who will be subject to two different types of pension scheme.

In order to remain in business, many companies will be tempted to pay lower wages and to attack bus workers' wages and conditions. The Act could well have been devised to facilitate greater exploitation of workers by their employers. Perhaps that was the motive for it.

I understand that 75 per cent. of existing services in Scotland have been registered and that the Scottish Bus Group has registered 81 per cent. of its services.

That is an indication of how it intends to operate. But in the Highland region only 20 per cent. of existing services have been registered. How does the Minister explain that away? How will Highland region be able to subsidise the tendered services necessary to maintain a semblance of its existing services?

Mr. David Mitchell: Where has the money been coming from to provide services on loss-making routes in that area?

Mr. Marshall: I assume that the local authority has taken a positive decision to subsidise socially desirable and essential services. There is nothing wrong with that. It is both acceptable and desirable. But it will be impossible to do that to anything like the same extent in future, because the money will not be available.

I do not know whether my next observation will prove true of other cities, but as a result of the Act, there will be utter chaos in Glasgow city centre. Is the Minister aware that in peak hours the number of buses using Argyll street, one of the busiest in Glasgow, will increase from 100 to 168 per hour? In Union street, the number will increase from 120 to 295 per hour, and in Hope street it will increase from 180 to a massive 309 per hour. That is only for the services that are already registered. As those three streets link up in the centre of the city, hon. Members can imagine the traffic jams that there will be. The city centre will come to a standstill. Timetables will mean nothing and utter chaos will result. The city will not be able to cope.

The sad thing is that there will be no overall benefit to the bus operators, because there just are not enough passengers to fill those buses, or even to half-fill them. Many of the people will not be prepared to sit and wait for the amount of time that it will take to make even a short journey. It just will not work.

There is great cause for concern about the position of British Rail in Strathclyde. It cannot plan ahead or estimate what effect bus deregulation will have on its income. A catastrophic drop in income, which could happen almost overnight, would mean many hundreds of extra redundancies. As Robbie Burns, the Scottish bard, once said:

"Forward tho' I cannae see,
I dread and fear."

That admirably sums up the public transport situation.

What is the Minister's assessment of the Act's effect on ferry services? He has now had enough time to assess the position. I can foresee many of the services that at present feed into the ferry services no longer operating. If the ferries become non-viable, will they be withdrawn, and will the islands be left with much more restricted services?

Deregulation day may be 26 October, but 26 January 1987 is an even more important day. We will then see just how many registered services are withdrawn after the initial three-month registration period. We will then see the full extent of the crisis in our public transport services as a result of the Act. As I have said, some chickens have already come home to roost. Thousands of jobs have been sacrificed on the altar of Tory party ideology. In the long term, no great benefit will accrue to the travelling public, although there may be short-term benefits. Yet again, the victims will be the most needy members of our society: the unemployed, the elderly, the young, the handicapped, the disabled, the non-drivers and the non-car owners. The Act must be committed to the wastebin by the next Labour Government.

8.37 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): One becomes accustomed to the hyperbole of motions, but I must comment on two aspects of today's motion. I could not help but smile at the reference to the abolition of the metropolitan councils. The Labour party has a cheek to insert that into the motion, as I believe that it is now in favour of their abolition and has no intention of reversing the clock. But I was also surprised to read of the "proven success of Labour transport policy".

For most of the years between 1964 and 1979, a Labour Government had full responsibility, and the Opposition now have no right to lecture this Government on the problems of public transport.

I wish to comment first on investment in road construction; secondly, on the disturbance from noise, vibration and other environmental disadvantages as a direct result of decisions taken by transport Ministers and, thirdly, on the impact of bus deregulation. I welcome the current substantial programme of road building and maintenance. It has been unfairly and unjustly underplayed and unsung. It deserves all the praise that the House can give it.

At the risk of being marginally parochial, I should like to comment on the current ministerial plans for the M42. Although this route may be primarily concerned with commercial transport, it has a direct impact on the motion because of the volume of public transport using the motorway. I understand that that motorway plans to deal with traffic flowing from the west midlands to the east and east coast ports. The perceived wisdom is that the M42 should join the M1 at exit 24. If one steps back a few paces and looks at the map of Britain, one sees clearly that there is no justification for that decision. If the traffic flows from the west midlands to the east coast ports on the Humber, it does not matter whether it joins the M1 at exits 23, 26 or even 27—the traffic would be moving north up the M1 and then to the Humberside ports. Traffic flowing to the growing ports on the East Anglian coast would wish to use exit 23 or lower exits because it would be travelling south of my home city of Nottingham. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look again at his plans for the M42 and exit 24.

Let us assume that the proposal is cast in tablets of stone and that the link will be at exit 24. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider on commercial and public transport grounds the six-mile stretch from junction 24 to the Nottingham boundary. That single track, six-mile stretch passes the largest solid fuel power station in Europe, and horrendous accidents occur on it. If there is to be a dual carriageway, I plead for dualling from junction 24 to the city boundary.

Whether or not my hon. Friend duals that six-mile stretch, he is committed to a major trunk road improvement on the A453 just outside and within the Nottingham city boundaries. The decision affects the public transport provision. If the improvements on the A453 result in a dual carriageway through or around the large estate of Clifton, it will have an impact on what is almost a small town, because 30,000 people live in the Clifton-Wilford-Silverdale area of Nottingham.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the extra time he has allowed to consider the matter and to look carefully at the competing alternatives. I thank him also for acknowledging clearly from day one the need for a public inquiry. I ask him to assure those 30,000 people that the inquiry will be open and conducted without prejudice.

We cannot separate the disturbance caused by commercial traffic and heavy public transport traffic in Greater Nottingham with an urban population of 550,000. I understand the problems—they concern the statute of limitations, or whatever the phrase is—caused by roads being built before a certain date when the affected population receives no help. It is clear that, if new improvements, widening or reconstruction affect people living nearby, they have redress in law to obtain sound-proofing and the like.

What is the position of people who live near a main road that carries much commercial and public transport traffic? What happens if that road existed before the Act provided protection? I draw the attention of the House to decisions made some miles away by Ministers of Transport which have a direct bearing on the environment and against which people have no protection. I draw attention to another parochial case concerning the Silverdale and Wilford estates in my constituency through which a dual carriageway passes. Only a few years ago, a decision was made to build a bypass loop road to the east of the city deliberately to bring large volumes of traffic on to the dual carriageway. The homes of people on the estates shake, even on Sunday morning, yet they are told that they have no protection in law because the road existed before the bypass. The bypass is five miles away and they therefore receive no compensation. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider this matter again.

I turn to the main part of the debate—the impact of deregulation. Reference has already been made to deregulation of motorway coaches, and I should like to refer to buses. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State pointed out, rightly, that it would appear from initial registration that we are dealing with 75 per cent. commercially viable, free, stand-alone, unsubsidised public transport services. I am delighted, because that 75 per cent. is better than we had hoped. In Nottingham, despite the horror stories and scare tactics which hon. Members on both sides of the House have noted month after month, 97 per cent. of existing services have been registered by Nottingham City Transport plc—so much for the so-called decimation of public transport under the legislation.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Now let us see it work.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Nottingham will make it work. In addition to the 97 per cent. registered by Nottingham

[Mr. Brandon-Bravo]

City Transport plc, one of the subsidiaries of the National Bus Company, Trent, has said that it, too, will take the opportunity to provide services into the city. The previous regulations did not allow it to do so.

I again thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his treatment of concessionary fares. We have all heard the scare stories. My postbag is full of letters from elderly people who are terrified about what will happen when the legislation "stops" them from being given concessionary fares. It is clear that the concessionary fares scheme in Greater Nottingham will remain. Because other operators will be involved, the scheme will be even better. Unfortunately, that will be quickly forgotten. It is up to Conservative Members constantly to remind people of the shameful way in which the Opposition use every possible device — no matter how much anguish it causes the elderly—to peddle abuses.

It is true that we have heard of loss of jobs. On paper —I say on paper — our undertaking will employ 100 fewer people than before. I stress that that is on paper because the staffing levels were something in excess of 1,100 persons. Of that so-called loss of 100 it transpires that 40 were unfilled vacancies and of the other 60, half have already been absorbed and the city will take the others, if necessary, into other jobs within the city council's employment. There is not the slightest risk of anybody being made redundant or the slightest difficulty in ensuring that everybody is employed. The 100 people that the new plc will not employ will mean lower costs.

On the matter of socially desirable routes, it sounds as if there is only 3 per cent. to subsidise. To be fair, some of the 97 per cent. of registered routes may have a lower frequency. [Interruption.] I do not wish to mislead the House and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) should not be so juvenile. Within the existing budget of a city as large as Nottingham was £750,000 of blanket subsidy from the rates. All that will happen now is that that £750,000 will be used by careful, well targeted and specially allocated subsidies to tendered socially desirable routes. The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) laughs. I challenge him to question me because that is the truth.

The scare campaigns go on. The citizens in our area were told that the wicked Transport Bill would cost the poor ratepayer £2·6 million extra on the rates. The Minister already has the details. Every single item on the list is phoney, because it is there already. Whether that Bill had become law or not the expenditure would have been part of the city's expenses on such things as pensions, administration, concessionary fares, debt charges, holiday pay, children's fares, concessions to the blind and disabled and so on. Every one of those items was a legitimate charge before the Bill and it is a perfectly legitimate charge afterwards. Nothing has changed. That is the way the scare stories go on.

I hope that when the population look at the way in which the Transport Act 1985 will work out, certainly in my area, they will realise what a con game was carried out by the Labour county council and the Labour city council and will realise that the Act is good for them because it puts the customer first, not the local authority.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) and the Secretary of State have alluded to what they claim to be a fictitious agitation and fear for the retention of free off-peak transport for old people in London and concessionary fares elsewhere. It was a legitimate fear. In fact, it was the most powerful lobby that London Members have experienced.

For a long time, no assurances were given that the Government would seek to persuade local authorities to retain those concessions. If they were retained, it was as a result of a great deal of agitation and lobbying, mainly from the Labour movement and the Labour party. Those are the facts and most old people understand that in London and elsewhere. Therefore, the indignation we have heard is artificial.

I bring to the debate a background, many years ago, as a railway worker. I am now sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union and am currently the chairman of the TGWU group in Parliament, which is 31-strong. I speak with some authority on the feeling of the organised workers in the bus industry, other sectors of the transport industry and members of the TGWU. We organise over 90 per cent. of road traffic workers in public transport.

I agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, South about motorways and other major highways and about the safety of the transport sector which intertwines with the management and Government policies towards the nation's transport. Road haulage workers in the TGWU are responsible for the bulk of freight carried by road. They work by day and night. Their alertness at all times is vital to road safety, including passenger road safety. That is why the House must look with deep sympathy at their worry about the weakening of rest period provisions, which, although customary in the United Kingdom, are threatened from September by EEC regulations. Perhaps the Minister will mention that worry.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) basically agrees with the Opposition's motion. He has agreed with members of the Select Committee on Transport on most of our criticisms of the Government's approach to transport, especially with regard to the Transport Act 1985, which has been freely alluded to in the debate. I understand that he cannot support us because he would have to bless Labour party policy. I imagine that is why he is prevented from joining us in the Lobby tonight.

However, most of what the hon. Gentleman had to say underscores the agreement of the bulk of the members of the Select Committee. I say "the bulk", because the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), who is sitting on the Conservative Benches, did not agree with the majority of us on that Committee. Nonetheless, some of his hon. Friends and one Liberal Member joined us to spray considerable doubt and criticism on the Transport Act 1985. In fact, the Select Committee's painstaking report gave a great deal of ammunition to our spokesmen on the Bill. The report was authoritative and based on experience.

Both the Opposition motions tonight disown the free-for-all basis of the Government's doctrinaire policies on transport. Years of experience, argument and discussion called for integration and co-ordination of all forms of movement on wheels and in the air. In other words, there is a call for planning. Although "no real co-ordination" is the Minister's watchword, the reverse is called for by so many transport experts. That claim is supported by common sense and history.

Some hon. Members, unfortunately not too many, will remember the pirate buses that operated in London. Experiences of that sub-standard system led to the creation of London Transport. Transport which puts people first requires public control for public purposes. That is the firm belief of the Transport and General Workers Union. It would be hard to find a member of that union with great experience of these matters who would come close to the Government's position on transport, although some must have voted for the Conservatives at the last general election. However, they must have been convinced by the Government acting under false pretences, but they would never dream of doing that now, when they consider the future for public transport.

The full impact of the Government's policies on bus deregulation has yet to be felt, but the changes in subsidy are causing sharp increases in fares. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) who was a fellow member of the Select Committee. He takes the same view as I, that although the initial impact of deregulation, privatisation or the innovative services, may produce extra public services, in the long run they will not work. In the long run, they do not reduce car traffic, they will cause congestion.

That is the simple logic of demand, needs and prices. The terraced streets of our major cities are being choked with cars, large and small. Ambulance and fire services cannot carry out their duties quickly. The congested roads mean more late arrivals at work, unpunctuality and less transport efficiency. Congestion wastes fuel and causes more wear and tear on those who require transport in their daily lives, especially those who work all hours of the night and day.

Since I have had the honour of being sponsored by the TGWU, I have been proud to specialise in matters concerning road passenger industry workers. The bus and coach workers who are an important group, are very worried about pay, reasonable hours, and their pensions. Those matters have not been settled in the National Bus Company.

I have already alluded to the massive redundancies that face those workers. They are worried about retaining their hard-won rights and they wish to be treated like decent human beings. They may not be so treated if the scale of privatisation envisaged by the Secretary of State goes ahead. The workers are worried about bus services, deregulation and the lowering of standards.

I have been told today that it is important to consider the standard of the vehicles which will be used by the privatised companies. Those vehicles must be up to the mark to gain the necessary licence and the traffic commissioners' blessing. We must look carefully at the conditions in which some of these vehicles are kept. I ask the Secretary of State carefully to consider the way in which many of these privatised vehicles will be kept. That will have a bearing on the overheads of private enterprises which are in competition with public ownership, as the public sector must, under the existing regulations, ensure that vehicles are kept in decent garages and are properly maintained.

It is too early to judge the results of innovations. That was apparent when we visited the Worcester-Hereford trial area. Conservative Members should consult the leader of the Hereford Tory group on the Conservative-controlled Hereford county council to discover what the council thinks after its experience of bus deregulation. The Opposition have ventilated those points sufficiently in a previous debate.

The Select Committee on Transport revealed wider opposition to the full aspects of the Transport Act 1985. With their fetish for privatisation, the Government have done nothing so far—not all Tory Members support that view, but it is certainly the belief of the guru who holds the office of Secretary of State for Transport—to allay the fears of transport workers. As the Opposition said, the Secretary of State has helped to bring about the defeat of the Tories at the coming municipal elections and at the next general election. The Labour party will provide transport for people and not simply for private profit. We believe that the latter weakens the trade union movement and the conditions of organised transport workers. Transport will be an issue at the general election as it has not been before to any profound degree. The issue will help us win a Labour victory, sanity for the people and justice for the transport workers.

9.5 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): The motion says:

"That this House strongly condemns the Government for the crisis in public transport which is the direct result of de-regulation of bus services".

However, total deregulation has not yet occurred. One cannot but think that the Opposition are trying to strike while there is much indecision and concern about the future prospects of public transport because after deregulation, when it is seen that all the fears were unfounded, it will be too late to present such a motion to the House.

As we have heard, the Select Committee on Transport, of which I am a member, visited Hereford among other places to see the experiment of deregulation. Many lessons were learnt there, some good and some bad. One thing that we learnt was that people in that area were for once in their lives being treated as customers rather than as passengers. We saw what a difference that made to them and what elation there was. At long last they were wanted by the bus undertakings that were providing the service. It was a miracle.

I shall never forget what was said by one Hereford lady. I think that she was a Liberal. Tut-tutting away, she said, "It really is a disgrace. The centre of Hereford is full of buses these days. We shall have to move the parking meters to make room for them." A Liberal—a person who I would have thought would be strongly in favour of a public transport system—was criticising the fact that car-parking space would have to be lost to accommodate the expanded bus service.

Deregulation will cause some problems as experiments in the new way of providing passenger transport in our conurbations develop. However, I am convinced that the formula is correct both for our cities and for our rural areas. My hon. Friends have mentioned a number of successful experiments. Another one is taking place in Luton — well away from my constituency. It was described recently in The Sunday Times in an article entitled "Fast lane for buses". It highlights a gentleman by the name of Bob Dudley, who runs a small minibus undertaking in that area. He is now making about £1,000 a week

"from six smart blue and white vehicles."

Mr. Dudley started his deregulated service earlier than most. According to the article:

"Dudley is convinced that the change will bring more jobs to the bus industry. 'There is so much opportunity here and in other towns that for any coach operator to say that unemployment will result is a load of nonsense. An improved service will lead to more people using buses and more jobs.'

This is happening in Luton. Dudley's six minibuses run every five or six minutes between the town centre and estates for a flat 20p fare (10p for children and pensioners) against the 45p municipal fare."

The result is not surprising:

"In two years the number of full-time drivers has increased from two to five, with four to five part-timers as back-up."

Mr. Dudley says that if he could raise £100,000 capital he could operate another 20 buses profitably in the Luton area.

Private operators are already successfully in the field in Exeter, the Isle of Wight, Worcester, Shrewsbury, and other places. Some of them are subsidiaries of the National Bus Company. They are proving successful in providing the services that the community requires. They are very different from the old monolothic undertakings with their fixed systems.

Jobs have been provided in the bus industry in other ways. There is the manufacture of buses. Freight Rover in Birmingham is currently the subject of a takeover bid or management buy-out. I rang the management today and found that Freight Rover has 500 minibuses on order. It is working flat out to provide a new product for an expanding market. That is the future.

The motion also discusses the future of the railway industry. The Opposition have criticised the railway for being rundown and neglected. I often wonder whether the Opposition ever bother to read any of the information that is published. Railnews is a testament to the achievement of management and unions and their acceptance and understanding of the future for the industry. The paper is full of good news. Line after line deals with expanding services and new products being introduced.

Mr. Flannery: My train was an hour late yesterday.

Mr. King: In 1979, when Labour went out of office, the Cambrian railway system, which runs from Shrewsbury to Machynlleth, Aberystwyth and Pwllheli was down and out. The speed limits were set at walking pace and there was old rolling stock. There was a total air of neglect and closure was threatening. What has happened after seven years of Tory Government?

The line has been expanded and developed—there is new rolling stock, new equipment, new sprinter trains and the reintroduction, for the first time in many years, of a through service from Pwllheli along the old Cambrian coast express. That is one example of a rural railway which has been totally revitalised as a result of the Government's policies of investment and the encouragement of investment in the railways.

It is good news all the way. Journey times from Lincolnshire, Peterborough, Cambridgeshire, the east and west midlands and north Wales will be as much as 20 minutes quicker as a result of new rolling stock. There has been an improvement of 40 minutes in the journey time of one Cambrian coast line train. There are new trains to Nottingham and Sheffield, and there will be a two-hourly sprinter service. Thanks to the Government's support, help is on the way for the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). The hon. Gentleman's train may have been late today, but, starting soon, it will be on time thanks to the investment that the Government are bringing to the railways.

The policy of the Government is simple — the passenger is no longer just the passenger, but has become the customer. He has the freedom of choice to decide how he will travel. The customer will dictate the level of services and where those services go. The response from the railway and the bus industries—sometimes lethargic — is that they have awakened to the fact that competition means a revitalised industry and many new opportunities. Management buy-outs are thrusting their way forward to obtain the bus industry from its present management. That augurs well for the future of public transport in this country.

9.12 pm

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): I served on the Standing Committee which dealt with the Transport Act 1985. I have had some difficulty in trying to work out how the Government will answer for the rubbish that was discussed in Committee, given the reality of the situation.

I have found this evening's debate staggering, although I must confess that the Government have been ingenious. There have been few times when Government predictions have become so unstuck so quickly, yet they talk as though nothing had happened.

I do not think that The Economist is a Marxist journal or even a Labour party journal. Last week's edition discussed deregulation and, in contrast to this evening's speeches, it said:

"Unavoidably, there will be some muddle on the roads. That's competition. Some unprofitable services will end. That's Government policy. But already there is avoidable muddle in preparing for deregulation, and more services may collapse than even the Government intends. That's Whitehall."

That contrasts strongly with the nonsense and the pure mythology which we have heard from the Government this evening.

I make no apology for speaking for my own area because I think that the Tyne and Wear transport system is a system of which not everyone in Tyne and Wear can be proud, but the Labour party and the Labour movement can be proud. In my area fares have increased by 20 per cent.—a 20 per cent. increase on a low fare policy. Yet the Government claim that they are bringing in policies to reduce fares. There have been hundreds of redundancies and the misery and confusion of deregulation. Mr. Martin Ballinger, the general manager of Northern General Transport, who is not a great friend of the Labour party so far as I am aware, said recently in public that from the point of view of bus management, deregulation is like playing darts in the dark.

It is disgraceful that tonight the Secretary of State and many of his supporters have tried to give the impression that on average 75 per cent. of all existing services have been registered commercially. That is not so. It is possible that 75 per cent. of the routes have been registered. I shall pass on with interest and malicious pleasure to the people living on estates in my constituency and to other people living on estates in the Sunderland and Tyne and Wear area, who do not have the benefit of any registered bus services and who have enjoyed until now a bus frequency of up to eight buses an hour, the fact that the Secretary of State has said that 75 per cent. of the services have been registered commercially. Their services have not been registered commercially. No buses have been running on a Sunday, or on weekdays after 7 o'clock at night.

In some cases the existing route has been registered, but where there used to be a bus every 10, seven, or even three minutes an hour on some of the busiest corridors, only two or, at the very most, four buses an hour are now running. That has to be contrasted with the nonsense that we have heard from Conservative Members about minibuses. If the orders from one of the major manufacturers of minibuses in this country have increased by only 500 as a result of the Government's policies, Conservative Members ought to be worried. They have no conception of the number of vehicles that are required to carry public transport passengers in urban areas that enjoy good public transport policies.

Mr. Caborn: I served on the Standing Committee with my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay). Does he realise that, since we served on that Committee, the Secretary of State has taken a great delight in ripping the centre out of the South Yorkshire passenger transport authority, that since 1 April fares have increased between 250 and 300 per cent., that use of the buses has fallen by 35 per cent. and that this has had a profound effect upon the community in south Yorkshire? We have been told by the committee that is running the transport service that the works services are not being registered. The price increase now being paid by each family is between £7 and £10 a week. That throws into disarray the argument that the Secretary of State lodged against the South Yorkshire passenger transport authority.

Mr. Clay: I agree with my hon. Friend. I was a great admirer of the south Yorkshire system. As a bus worker I watched the success of that system and argued successfully for the introduction of a similar system in my area. It breaks my heart to hear those figures about south Yorkshire. It also breaks my heart that although in my area, which enjoyed the second lowest fares in the country after south Yorkshire, the overall fare increase so far has been only—I say "only" because of the comparison with south Yorkshire — 20 per cent., the 5p flat fare for children has already been doubled from 5p to 10p. Conservative Members may say, "What is a 5p increase?" If a family with two children makes one return journey a day for five days a week, that fare increase alone will cost the family £2 more each week. That is before taking into account the increase in adult fares.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North referred to the fact that no works journeys have been registered in south Yorkshire. That also applies to the Sunderland area of Tyne and Wear. Nobody has registered the existing works journeys that carry people to and from the shipyards, the pits and Rolls-Royce. They will not be registered because they are not regarded as commercially viable.

It is a myth to say that 75 per cent. of the existing services have been registered. The bus mileage will be way below the previous figure. It is not the people who see public transport as a profit-making operation, but the people who depend on it in the evenings, on Sundays, very early in the morning, when it is the only way that they can get to work, who will suffer as a result of this—unless, of course, the passenger transport authority can put more money into providing a massive range of subsidies because it cannot have the cross-subsidy that it has depended on until now.

Mr. Caborn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Not again.

Mr. Caborn: Have you finished?

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: There are other hon. Members who want to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. Hon. Members should address the Chair.

Mr. Caborn: Does my hon. Friend know that in south Yorkshire where 64 per cent. of the routes have been registered, only 31·6 per cent. of the total registered mileage is included in that 64 per cent? I think that underlines the point that has been made.

Mr. Clay: That is one of the most revealing statistics that has been given tonight, and it gives the lie to the empty propaganda that we have heard from the Government Benches.

Mr. Flannery: Sheer lies.

Mr. Clay: My hon. Friend, from a sedentary position, has used an unparliamentary expression which I would be extremely tempted to use myself, but I want to move on.

It is hypocritical of the Government to make the point that even those parts of the services that are not registered —they claim that it is only 25 per cent., but we argue that it is more — can be subsidised by the local authority.

Tyne and Wear has had a 17 per cent. increase in its precept for public transport. That is very interesting given that the Government argued—this is another matter that we have been debating tonight—that the abolition of the metropolitan counties would save rates. We have a situation in which the passenger transport authority in my own area has already had to increase its precept for public transport by 17 per cent., despite the fact that the abolished county council had held the overall precept, including that for public transport, steady for two years. That precept will have to be increased even more in the future when the full reality of what will need to be subsidised dawns on people later this year.

The whole theme of what we have heard from the Government tonight has been minibuses, and this sums up the argument. I ask myself what this country would look like—it is laughable if one thinks about it—if we were seriously to consider running public transport systems on the basis of minibuses. I have nothing against minibuses. I wrote a pamphlet with some mild criticisms of my own much admired and respected PTE some years ago suggesting that it might buy a few minibuses. I wish that it had, and no doubt it now will.

It was not the Government who thought up minibuses; they came in long before the Act. Minibuses are very good for an estate which has not a large number of people using public transport, and in rural areas in some cases, but the idea that the cities of this country — London, Birmingham, Manchester, Newcastle, Sunderland,

[Mr. Clay]

Edinburgh, Glasgow — can have a public transport system in which minibuses play anything more than a very peripheral part is an absolute absurdity.

The tragedy is that, because of the abolition of the metropolitan counties, the withdrawal of subsidy, deregulation, the chaos that is being created, the demoralisation, and the way passengers are being driven away from public transport, in those areas such as Tyne and Wear and south Yorkshire, where ridership had gone up, we may end with third or fourth-rate public transport systems in which the Government have achieved their objective and the only public transport is minibuses because hardly anybody else is in a position to provide or use public transport. That seems to me to be the final irony of the Government's obsession with minibuses.

It is a mini-policy for public transport and I hope that my hon. Friends will not only support the Opposition motion tonight but be determined to carry out its sentiments and rebuild, when we have a Labour Government, on the lines of the inspiring example of areas such as Tyne and Wear and south Yorkshire.

9.25 pm

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): I should like to speak about Greater Manchester, of which my constituency forms a part. There has been a spate of inaccurate information aimed at scaring the public, especially the elderly, about cuts in bus routes. It is a malicious campaign and those responsible for it should be ashamed of themselves. My local newspaper, the Bolton Evening News, said on 9 April under the headline:

"Going, going, gone!

More than one tenth of the bus services now running in Greater Manchester will disappear on Oct 25".

The paper tells us that out of 600 routes now operating, 439 have been registered, and on the same page there is a quote from an executive of the PTA who says:

"100 communities . . . stand to lose all public transport".

When we look to see how those figures are arrived at, it becomes clear that there is a suggestion that because a service has not been registered the people in the area will lose public transport. That is a mischievously inaccurate suggestion that is designed purely to scare the most vulnerable members of the public.

It is said in slightly more rational statements by Labour politicians that a subsidy of £15·5 million is available for the remaining routes, and that even with an 11 per cent. increase in fares there will be an £8 million shortfall. We are told that only by cutting 10 per cent. of the routes can that shortfall be made up. We are asked to believe that no possible savings can be made in operating costs. That is plainly nonsense.

Greater Manchester PTE bus unit costs are some 25 per cent. higher than average bus costs in other metropolitan areas. The assumption by the Opposition and apparently by officers of the PTE is that, in spite of this clear evidence of extravagant and wasteful management, there is no scope for major savings. Clearly, savings are possible in labour costs. There are absurd and unnecessary overtime agreements in some depots, and savings can be made in servicing and in repairs and maintenance. During the debate we heard how immense savings have been made by London Regional Transport with only a minuscule reduction in passenger mileage. Is it seriously suggested that it is not possible to make savings in Greater Manchester transport?

To make up the alleged £8 million shortfall would require only a 5 per cent reduction in costs. This does not even take into account the operating surpluses on many of the routes already registered to be operated by Greater Manchester buses. Is there a business in Britain that cannot make a 5 per cent. saving on costs? In the last few years, British industry has found cost savings of 10, 20 or 30 per cent., yet in the case of a top-heavy municipal transport undertaking we are asked to believe that it cannot even find 5 per cent.

Why have local politicians, especially the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) bought this claptrap from the officers of the PTE? It is because in most municipal enterprises, the political masters have no commercial experience. When the politicians are told by managers who do not want to upset their own comfortable existence that they are running a lean and efficient operation and can make no savings, they do not have the ability or the will to disagree with them, even though the absurdity of the argument is staring them in the face. What do they do? They give up before they even start and resort to playing politics in the press, scaring local people, especially the elderly and the less well off, about withdrawals, first, of concessionary fares—which turned out to be nonsense—and now about necessary services.

I am not saying that there will be no withdrawal of services in Greater Manchester. The Greater Manchester PTE has not been particularly successful in the past in matching services to demand and it may well be that services which should have been reduced in the past now will be. But there is no reason why any socially necessary routes should be cut. If they are, it is thanks to the failure of locally elected members and local management to do their job, to come up to date and to provide an efficient transport enterprise for the bus users of Greater Manchester.

9.29 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): This has been a debate with two halves. Conservative Members have loyally supported the Minister although here and there an occasional apprehension of what might happen has crept through even some of their laudatory speeches. On the other hand, my hon. Friends have spoken with deep feeling about the realities of the situation, as they are advised, not by politicians, as the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) said, but by professionals with years of experience in running municipal transport. The facts have been given to us by those who know the business. An American once said to me: "You are entitled to your own opinions but you are not entitled to your own facts." The facts of the matter are quite clear.

The Department of Transport has been one of the most prolific, if not the most prolific, in begetting of legislation. Since the Government came to power, 33 Acts of Parliament have been put on the statute book by the Department of Transport, 16 of which have a direct effect on public transport. Ministers from the Department of Transport are the perpetual stars of the television programme, "It will be all right on the night", that famous programme of goofy clips. Here we are, 33 takes later, and their performance is getting worse not better.

The Government's response to the Opposition's motion is curious because it begins, "Leave out from 'House'". But if one reads the Government's amendment one finds that they have reinstated many of the words in the original motion. They have reinstated the words:

"which are based upon choice, freedom and fairness to improve the quality of life for the whole community and particularly for those who depend entirely upon public transport."

In other words, the Government are wholly converted to Labout party policies and have adopted them as their own. The Emperor of Marsham street is now fully clothed. One hopes that he will now venture out into the cold real world of transport which he has created, and perhaps look at his transport legislation, repeal it and make a fresh beginning.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) spent most of his speech discussing bus passenger transport, and I want to spend a few minutes on British Rail, not least because some challenges have been made about investment figures. The Government have boasted about their investment in British Rail. The Minister said that the Government have given British Rail all the cash it wanted. Indeed, they have boasted again tonight about their investment programme.

The Minister challenged me to find the figures to prove otherwise. I always like to respond to a challenge but when I do so I like to look at the facts. I do not want to quote facts from any Labour party handouts but from the Secretary of State himself. I am sure that he will accept the accuracy of those figures. In 1984 he replied to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) about investment in British Rail, giving figures for each year since 1979 at 1983 prices — in other words, at constant prices, giving a true comparison, like for like. He said that total investment in British Rail in 1979 was £539 million; in 1980 it was £525 million; in 1981 £451 million, and in 1982 £345 million. Certainly 1983 was projected at £380 million. Where has the great increase in investment come from? Those figures show a continual decline in the four years since the Government took office. Those are the facts. They are the Secretary of State's own figures which he cannot challenge, unless he has been lying in Hansard, and, of course, he would not do that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Moreover, figures in British Rail's latest corporate plan show, again at constant prices, that when the Government came to office in 1979 there was a large reduction in investment in British Rail from 1979 until 1982. It is true that investment is due to rise for the next few years, but the fact is that averaged over the period between 1979 and 1986 during this Government's period of office, average investment in British Rail has been lower than the amount invested in British Rail by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979. Indeed, investment averaged out at a lower rate during the Labour Government's period. Actually, investment went up and remained relatively stable until we left office. There is the true comparison, like with like. The Secretary of State has been seeking to give misleading figures.

From 1985-86, a bit of upturn is projected. That is supposed to peak in 1987-88, and to fall again between 1990 and 1991 to below the figure which the Labour Government achieved between 1974 and 1979.

Far from my hon. Friend from Wigan passing me a poisoned chalice, what he has passed me, being a good rugby man, is the ball, so that I can score a try.

If we go further into these investments, what we have to look at as well, is what British Rail in 1981 projected as its investment programme after the Government announced that there was to be a 25 per cent. reduction in support for British Rail.

The 1981 projection for 1983 was £495 million. The 1983 projection for the same year was £279 million. The 1984 projection was £525 million, as compared to £357 million. For 1985, it was supposed to be £535 million. It was reduced to £430 million. In 1986 British Rail said that it wanted £564 million, and under the 1981 projection, the 1983 projection was £406 million. In 1987 it was supposed to be £573 million. The 1983 projection was £400 million. In 1988 it projected that in 1981 it would want £565 million. In 1983, the revised projection was £350 million. In every one of these cases the projection was substantially lower than the projection in 1981.

That is the true measure of how British Rail has had to respond to Government cuts in investment plans. We spend only 0·32 per cent. of GNP as compared with other railway countries, such as Austria, Belgium, France, Italy, Holland, Switzerland and West Germany, which spend 0·76 per cent.

If people want to look for mitigating factors, I have no doubt that Ministers would say, "Well, of course, it is all right to reduce these projections, because there would have been a reappraisal of needs. British Rail performance exceeded expectations, and there was no need for investment." I need quote only one document to show the utter fallacy of that excuse. The transport users' consultative committee for the north-east of England, published a document in February 1986 which, in the introduction by Mr. James Towler the chairman, says:

"I derive no satisfaction in reporting a big increase (33 per cent.) in the number of complaints we received regarding British Rail services during 1985; nor in reflecting on the many examples of unimaginative timetabling, incomprehensible fares and poor information relating to trains that were often overcrowded, dirty and late."

It gives me no satisfaction either to quote this sort of thing. The document goes on:

"Sadly, this represents a continuing trend which has accelerated during the last three years and is a matter of great concern. It coincides with a measure of success on the part of British Rail towards meeting their objective of a 25 per cent. cut in the Passenger Service Obligation by 1987. This suggests that rail users are bearing the brunt of economies as British Rail managers strive to meet their cost reduction targets.

My overriding concern is whether British Rail, in its eagerness to achieve financial targets agreed with central Government, can also meet its commitment to provide a reasonable service for its passengers".

So say all of us.

Of course, it is not only the passenger who will have to pay the price. Other people who have paid the price for British Rail are the railwaymen who have lost their jobs because of cuts in the work force. There were 182,000 employed in British Rail in 1979; that is down to 144,000. We have all heard from the Government that the object of the exercise is to slim down the work force so that British Rail can be leaner and fitter. The truth is that the patient is suffering from anorexia.

On the bus passenger side, the Secretary of State answered not a single charge made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan. The Secretary of State spoke in blissful ignorance of the facts. He cannot deny that. Sadly, many of my hon. Friends could not speak in the debate, but when they have put down questions asking for information about specific areas, the answer they have got is, "I do not know." The Secretary of State has said that he does not know the facts, yet he has the nerve to give the House today a rosy picture of how everything will turn out.

Hon. Members have described how difficult things will be. The Highland region of Scotland has been quoted. Only 20 per cent. of its services have been registered. The Secretary of State is in blissful ignorance not only of what is happening in the localities but also about what the Secretary of State for the Environment is doing; he has cut the money available to local authorities. They have been rate-capped. They have been savaged by local authority auditors and taken to court.

All the professional advice we have is that services will be cut, fares will increase, and there will be more redundancies. I am told that the National Bus Company is sitting on over 7,000 redundancies, in addition to the 20,000 which have been mentioned by the Secretary of State. Enormous costs will be involved. We have been told that the Secretary of State will bale out new companies which will take over NBC subsidiaries; the Government will subsidise the redundancy payments. It is a disgrace if new companies are to be given such a start.

The Secretary of State may have a point when he says that we cannot know what will happen. That is true, because October is some time away. All the evidence is that the position will be much worse than the Secretary of State has suggested. There is not a large number of new companies coming forward. At night, on Sundays and in the early mornings there will not be services. Where companies were operating in competition with one another to provide hourly services, the services will run within five minutes of each other at peak times, but at off-peak times there will be no buses. Where services previously operating between A and B have gone off the main road into villages to pick up passengers, that will cease; the services will run directly from A to B.

Private bus operators have told me that they believe the competition will be so cut-throat that safety standards will be threatened. They have told me that they would rather go out of business than run on that basis. The Secretary of State has brought forward a cowboys' charter.

In his amendment, the Secretary of State has apparently adopted Labour party policy objectives, but it is a smokescreen for his true philosophy. He expounded that philosophy with great frankness and candour, for which I pay him credit, when he went to the annual dinner of the Bus and Coach Council. Having gone through the different legislative measures, he said to bus operators, "You are now free to operate without the constraints of the social conscience." That means that the elderly, women and children are going to suffer. We know that the Secretary of State has no social conscience. That is why he will be condemned, and that is why the House should support the motion.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): When the Conservatives introduced choice and competition on the long-distance coach services, the Opposition proclaimed disaster, and, in the transition from the old to the new system, they endlessly prophesied crises. They were wrong, and now everybody can see that they were wrong.

There has been more investment in long-distance coaches, not less. There are more long distance services, not fewer. There are more jobs and more coaches, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) demonstrated. There are more passengers and there are lower fares. All these benefits have come from choice and from competition.

Mr. Flannery: It is not true.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman may say that it is not true. I shall write to him with the facts and figures so that he can see that what I have said to the House is absolutely accurate.

It is extraordinary that the Opposition have learnt absolutely nothing. They are back on the same proclamations of disaster and the same prophecies of crises as we start to introduce choice and competition for local bus services.

The background to the debate is twofold. First, there is the local election campaign and the Opposition's intended use of today as an opportunity of further misrepresentation and scandalmongering designed to frighten people into believing that they will lose bus services. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) gave a good example of that from his local newspaper.

I should perhaps remind the House that we are in the middle of transition from the old system of monopoly to a system of choice and competition. The transition involves two separate stages. The first was the registration of the profitable commercial viable routes by 28 February, and they were published on 1 April by the traffic commissioners. What Opposition Members have been doing is pretending that that is the end of the story and that what is registered as a commercial route represents all the services that will be run. They know perfectly well that there is a second phase to transition. This is the phase when substantial sums are made available to the councils and local authorities concerned, and the joint boards, to buy in services on the socially necessary routes that have not been registered, and the people on those routes will have the certitude of a service and a contract with their county council or PTE.

Against that background, I deplore the deliberate misrepresentations of the facts by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). Every Member in the Chamber heard him refer to west Derbyshire. I had to drag out of him the fact that the list of services that he read out with such relish, implying a huge cutback, was only of registered services. The hon. Gentleman ought to be ashamed of himself for behaving in that way. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman went on to say, "We were beginning to get it right." I suppose that that refers to the chronic decline in bus services, with more subsidies, higher fares, and fewer passengers in recent years.

Mr. Stott: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me where there has been any chronic decline in the PTE areas in the last 12 years? The chronic decline in public transport has been in the rural areas, where Conservative-controlled councils have put no money into public transport.

Mr. Mitchell: I shall be happy to deal with that shortly, because an important point comes out of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

The inefficiencies bred by the monopoly system have meant higher fares in the shire counties, and the bill has been passed on to the ratepayers in the metropolitan counties in a scandalous fashion.

When the hon. Gentleman says, "We were beginning to get it right," I do not think anybody seeing the decline that has taken place—certainly not the 20,000 National Bus Company employees who have lost their jobs in the last decade—would say that the hon. Gentleman was beginning to get it right.

The hon. Gentleman made a rather cheap reference to my alleged failure to answer a parliamentary question. He suggested that I had wilfully withheld information from the House. We could have given the vehicle mile figure from the fuel duty rebate statistics, but that was not the question that I was asked. I was asked for the route miles, which is quite different——

Mr. Stott: No.

Mr. Mitchell: There is a great deal of difference between route miles and the amount of miles run by vehicles on the routes. We do not have the figures for which the hon. Gentleman asked—[Interruption.] We do not have them.

The hon. Gentleman claimed that disaster faces the Greater Manchester council area and the PTE in tackling deregulation. Perhaps he knows—but perhaps he does not—that Mr. Hickman, the chairman of the Greater Manchester council transport committee last year told a conference that 90 per cent. of routes needed subsidy—that is, only 10 per cent. were commercial. Now, so great is the improvement in efficiency that has already been wrought by the approach of competition that 56 per cent. of routes have been registered—not 10 per cent., but 56 per cent. Truly the galvanising effect of competition is even greater than I had hoped.

Another example is West Yorkshire, where last year 55 per cent. of routes were in need of subsidy. Now, 70 per cent. of bus mileage has been registered as commercial network. That is not conclusive, but it has meant a remarkable reduction in cost to make those routes competitive.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) referred to investment in British Rail. He made an unintended mistake. He said that he was scoring a try, but he will have to try harder. He quoted the level of investment on the ground, but if he looks at the figures for approval for investment, which is what comes to the Government and some time later appears on the ground as actual investment, he will see a different picture from that which he described.

The real question is how many applications for investment Ministers have turned down. It is for British Rail to propose and for Ministers to dispose. I have turned down only one application from British Rail — for electrification between Royston and Cambridge. In giving the go-ahead to the electrification of the east coast main line, we have given the go-ahead to the largest single electrification investment in British Rail for 25 years. The hon. Gentleman should take that into the score.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) asked whether the NBC managements would have preference with buy-outs. I am glad of the opportunity to clarify the position. Where bids from employees and third parties are broadly comparable, preference will be given to employee bids. I hope that a large number of them will be successful.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Tyne and Wear system as an integrated system that would come to an end——

Mr. Stephen Ross: No.

Mr. Mitchell: I may have misunderstood. I shall make the position clear.

The integrated system on Tyne and Wear depends upon the metro and the feeder routes coming into it. If those feeder routes are not provided commercially, they can be provided by the PTE under the tendering system. Either way, the integrity of the system—that is the feeder routes and the metro—can remain intact while people want it. The implication of the hon. Gentleman's remarks is the exceedingly illiberal thought that people should not be allowed to use other services and other means of transport, even if that is what they would prefer.

The hon. Gentleman asked what would happen to Eastleigh, and said that British Rail would need a major works in the South. I have no information to suggest that British Rail does not intend to maintain a major works at Eastleigh. I met a deputation yesterday led by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and including a large number of people from the works. I undertook to convey some very sensible points that they put to me to the management of British Rail, and a letter doing so will be on its way tomorrow.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Settle-Carlisle line and tourism. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has recently been drawing attention to the valuable opportunities for exploiting the railway system as a means of enabling tourists to see the scenic beauty of parts of the country.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I assure the hon. Gentleman that when we receive the transport users consultative committee's two reports we will consider the hardship matters to which tey draw attention, as well as the wider areas such as tourism and other matters raised in questions in the House yesterday.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) raised important matters affecting roads in that area. I shall ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley)—who deals with that matter to write to my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend also referred to terrified elderly people who were led to believe that concessionary fares would disappear. I join him in his condemnation of the way in which the Labour party has used—in the worst sense of the word—elderly people and frightened them into believing that they would lose their concessionary fares. I believe that the Labour party will live to regret its misrepresentation, because there will be a boomerang effect. Many people who have been frightened will know that the Labour party misled them and will not forget that when they cast their votes.

The latest scare campaign in Nottingham involves the suggestion of a huge increase in financial liabilities. In circumstances such as that an accountant is needed as chairman of the transportation committee, and I can only imagine that in Nottingham there is a turf accountant.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) referred to increases in the number of bus services causing congestion in Glasgow. Those services are registered because operators believe that they can fill the buses, and that will mean fewer cars and less congestion.

Finally, I refer to the central point of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North. The most extraordinary feature of the debate is the Opposition motion, which refers to Labour's transport policy as being based on choice, freedom and fairness. The Labour party must be joking. I could hardly believe my eyes when I saw that. The fact is that the Labour party has carried out extensive market and survey research to discover what the voters want, and has found that they want choice, freedom and fairness, but which party would produce it?

Let us consider which party's policy gives more choice. The Government's policy is for competing services, but this has often been attacked as wasteful duplication. Many leaflets were distributed showing a queue of buses and people trying to decide which one to catch. Does that or the Labour policy give the better choice? The Labour party supports local monopoly and a regulated system, with one operator on the route. Under that policy there is no choice for the operator or for the passenger. How can the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North say that that is a policy of choice?

Let us consider fairness. Where was the fairness in a system that denied those who paid, either as passengers or ratepayers, the improvement in efficiency that competition brings? Where was the fairness in a system in which the cost falling on ratepayers in the shire counties averaged £5·20 a head? In the metropolitan counties the cost to ratepayers averaged £36·60 a head, and in South Yorkshire it was £60 a head for every man, woman and child in the county. Where was the fairness in a system that imposed so great a burden on the rates in some parts of the country that businesses were scared away, with consequent higher unemployment and an increased burden for everyone?

Mr. Allen Adams (Paisley, North) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agree to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on its radical approach to the long standing problems of public transport, its determination to obtain value for money and its introduction of policies of competition and deregulation for the benefit of the passenger which are based upon choice, freedom and fairness to improve the quality of life for the whole community and particularly for those who depend entirely upon public transport.

BTR Sarmcol

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

10.23 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): This debate arises as a result of representations that I have received from two leading black South African trade unionists who have visited Britain in recent weeks. At a press conference held in the House on 10 April, Moses Mayekiso, the Transvaal organiser of the Metal and Allied Workers' Union, and Jeremiah Zulu, the president of the Transport and General Workers' Union in South Africa, who are both members of the central executive committee of the recently formed Congress of South African Trade Unions, or COSATU, reported to me their federation's concern for the actions of the South African subsidiary of the British-owned BTR Group. Under the code of conduct by which British owned multinationals operate in South Africa they are requested, each year, to declare to the Department of Trade and Industry answers to a number of questions under the EEC code of conduct. For the period ended 30 June 1985 BTR stated under the heading "Progress made in Implementing Policy" the following:

"At BTR Sarmcol, Howick a trade union with majority representation was responsible for collective bargaining on behalf of all waged employees and had negotiated a wage agreement and were negotiating on grievance and disciplinary procedures and a retrenchment procedure. Negotiations broke down and the agreement with the trade unions was discontinued. New negotiating machinery is currently under review."

Those weasel words belie the fact that almost a year ago —on 30 April 1985—1,000 workers who were on a legal strike were sacked by BTR after a 10-year battle for union recognition and a two-year negotiation with the company.

One of the major concerns of COSATU and the Metal and Allied Workers Union which represented the victimised workers is that the EEC guidelines which are supposed to protect the interests of these workers, and the Government's policy of "constructive engagement" with South African capitalism which is supposed to ameliorate the worst excesses of apartheid have acted in this case —I would argue in all others—as nothing more than smoke screens for the exploitative actions of British companies which are only too happy to reap the super-profits that come from the cheap labour system which is the essence of apartheid.

BTR can effectively put its case through its press officers and the British press. That avenue is largely denied to workers. It has led to a series of wild claims by BTR management. In an interview in the January 1986 edition of the European Rubber Journal the chairman of the newly merged operation—BTR South Africa and Dunlop South Africa—the perhaps aptly-named Peter Fatherley made a series of allegations on how well the company was run and on its operations. The unions' response to those allegations in a leaflet appropriately headed "BTR's Fatherley Advice" picked those points to pieces.

I shall give an example of some of those allegations as an illustration to the Minister this evening. BTR claimed that it provided a pension scheme and loans for home purchase. Perhaps that is true. But the company does not agree to requests from the workers because its policy is not to extend home loans to hourly paid employees.

I shall quote a number of cases which will illustrate the value of the pension scheme. Mr. S. Zuma a national executive member of MAWU, employed by Sarmcol for two periods which totalled more than 20 years was given, on retirement, a pension of 4·2 rand per month which represents less than £2 a month. Mr. S. Zuma has now passed away.

Mr. Zakwe stopped work in 1982 after 25 years' service with BTR. His pension was the equivalent of £10 per month. Another worker with 22 years' service received 35 rand per month, which is less than £10 a month.

BTR claims to provide educational grants for the children of black employees and to provide basic education for their employees. BTR's educational grants amount to the following: for primary schools grants of 120 rand, about £40 per year for 16 selected schoolchildren. That is a total of 1,800 rand, the equivalent of £600. Secondary school grant is nil and the grant for tertiary education is also nil.

BTR claims to have set high standards in its relationship with its black employees, as it claims it has an integrated work force, with black foremen. It does not mention the fact that these racial groups cannot even share the same toilet facilities, and not a single black person is in lower middle management or above.

Perhaps the best example of the two worlds that are inhabited by the senior management of BTR and those who comprise the bulk of its work force is given in an interview about four and a half years ago with Sir Owen Green, the managing director of BTR, in The Observer of 27 September 1981. He said:

"Growth is the objective, profit is the measure . . . I don't believe British industrial companies really commit themselves to the bottom line, to profit . . . The education system doesn't encourage this idea. Those educated post-war have been taught, almost brainwashed, that it is socially undesirable to make much money. So they combine other objectives: that it is just as important to have good personnel policy, decent factories, to play a significant social role. They blur the issues—the key is the bottom line."

The salary of Sir Owen Green was raised from £97,000 a year to £142,000 a year in late 1984, but the starting wage of an employee at BTR Sarmcol is 336 rand — approximately £80 a month, or £20 a week.

For these reasons, Brother Zulu of the TGWU is visiting the House tonight. I ask the Minister when he replies to these points to bear in mind that he is not speaking directly just to the few hon. Members who are in the Chamber this evening. He is also speaking indirectly to the 500,000 organised workers in the South African trade union federation, COSATU. They have been involved in solidarity action with the BTR Sarmcol strikers, who include 90 per cent. of the workers in the Howick-Pietermaritzburg area who went on strike on 18 July 1985. There was also a two-month boycott of white businesses in the same area and in recent weeks solidarity strikes have taken place in a number of other plants in the newly merged BTR-Dunlop group. These workers will want clear answers from the Minister about whether the British Government intend to oppose the circumvention of the pious hopes that are contained in the EEC code of conduct, or whether they are prepared to condone the open flouting of what is widely regarded among the South African working class as a "bulldog with rubber teeth."

I draw the Minister's attention in particular to the misleading nature of much of the information that is contained in BTR's own report on the code of conduct for the 12 months to 30 June 1984. In its submission the company claims that only 95 of its 2,377 employees are paid below the university of South Africa's supplementary cost of living level. This was set at 287 rand a month in February 1984. That is approximately £25 a week. MAWU has consistently claimed that many more BTR employees are paid below the level to which the company will admit. This is borne out by a company circular entitled "Revised Wages Structure" dated 2 August 1985. It is in the union's possession and it gives details of the wage rates being paid to the strike-breaking work force that has been recruited to run the Howick plant. This document shows that, despite an increase of between 12 and 18 per cent. on basic wages, employees in grades 1 to 4, in which the overwhelming number of employees are located, are still being paid starvation wages, below the minimum requirements of the EEC code. Indeed, allowing for an annual inflation rate of 18 per cent., by the end of July of this year the basic minimum rate of BTR Sarmcol will be more than 40 per cent. below the supplementary living level requirements in the Durban area.

This failure to provide factual information about the activities of companies such as BTR is enough to call into question the EEC code. However, my criticism goes far deeper. Since 1977 Britain has subscribed to the EEC code of conduct for companies with subsidiaries in South Africa. This code requires that these companies should submit to the Department of Trade and Industry an annual return that provides information about their attitude towards worker representation, trade unions, the pay of their black employees, their wage structures, fringe benefits and the extent of desegregation at work. The most important aspect of the code is the pay recommendations, which have become enshrined not as the minimum level but as the goal to which these companies aspire. The minimum standard of living level is the lowest sum upon which a specific size of household can live in the South African social set-up. The MLL contains 10 basic elements, such as food, clothing, rent, fuel and light. Their costs are meticulously calculated, and make fascinating reading. For example, under personal hygiene a household of six is assumed to use per month

"3 x 100g Lifebuoy soap, toilet paper, 15 razor blades per year for Blacks and 45 for Coloured and Indian males over 18 and sanitary requisites."

Replacement of household equipment

"assumes that a bed, or chair will last 15 years, saucepans, kettles and fry-pans 10 years."

Any wage below this would be a starvation wage.

"The Supplemented Living Level makes provision for more items . . . the SLL is not a subsistence budget, nor is it a luxury budget. Perhaps it can best be described as an attempt at determining a modest low-level standard of living."

Again these standards differ for different racial groups. The SLL makes some allowances for personal care, for example, toothpaste, one toothbrush per person per year, and for hair-cuts, for recreation and entertainment, contributions to pensions, unemployment, medical and burial funds. It also allows for additional expenditure on the basic items in the minimum living level. In practice, the SLL is roughly 50 per cent. greater than the MLL, and still represents a very low standard of living.

In fact, both these figures are merely reflections of starvation levels and are not even recognised by black workers and their unions as being a realistic assessment of the actual living needs of workers in South Africa. In addition, a number of highly questionable premises are used in drawing up the figures. For example, an inflation rate was assumed, for the period February to August 1985 of 3·6 per cent. when the actual annual rate of inflation was 16 per cent., more than twice the rate assumed. The study also established 5·5 dependants in the average-sized black family, despite the fact that the average is more like eight persons per breadwinner in the Howick area.

This might seem like abstract statistical hair-splitting to hon. Members, but what it adds up to is that the EEC code of conduct and the university of South Africa living levels serve to whitewash a situation in which 20 per cent. of the children of BTR employees in Howick aged between two and nine suffer from malnutrition. The literally starvation wages paid by this company mean that in 1984 BTR's South African operations contributed 3 per cent. of the company's £200 million profits after tax on only 2 per cent. of its sales, while the British operations contributed 42 per cent. on 45 per cent. of sales.

That would be a sufficiently outrageous state of affairs if it were the only misuse of the code of conduct by one single unscrupulous employer. However, it is increasingly obvious that the policy of this Government and of big business generally and the interests that they represent is to use that code to shield companies from the outrage of workers in Britain and South Africa and internationally. Only a minority of the 400 British companies, which between then own half the 2,000 foreign-owned companies in South Africa and therefore control £12 billion of foreign investment in that country, even send in reports. One of the first actions of this Government, on taking office in 1979, was to cease the practice of listing those companies which failed to comply with the guidelines for the code.

Had it not been for some sharp eyes, the latest Department of Trade and Industry report would have claimed that the number of black employees of British-owned companies paid below the EEC levels had halved. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), who is present with me this evening, has noted that the EEC report has already had to be amended by an erratum slip since it was issued three weeks ago and now shows a massive 21 per cent. increase in the number of black workers in South Africa paid below the lower datum level and a 33 per cent. increase in those paid below the upper datum level, taking the situation back to 1978 levels.

One company alone, Pritchards Services Group, which is not unknown to at least one Tory Member, has admitted to paying 1,660 black workers less than poverty wages. That is almost double the 900 total figure disclosed three weeks ago by the Britain Government.

There is a growing realisation among workers in British and South Africa of the manner in which the capitalist class and its political representatives use the EEC code to prop up rather than undermine apartheid. That common cause of the BTR management and the Tory Government is precisely the same common cause made between its South African subsidiary and the Botha Government, whose police have arrested over 100 striking workers in Howick and in September last year opened fire on a crowd of strikers and their families, killing one child and causing the hospitalisation of three others.

This realisation by workers has been accompanied by an understanding that the only way to tackle companies such as BTR, which seek to use the apartheid system as a source of ready profits, is to use their own strength as workers by building direct links between British and South African workers to expose and undermine the thousands and millions of threads that tie together the City of London and the slave labour system in South Africa.

Through this debate I give notice to the Minister and to his friends in the British multinationals. They have had an easy ride so far, but the formation of COSATU and its clear appeal to workers internationally for support mean that in future the Minister and his friends will face the wrath of the organised working class of South Africa. Workers will not just show solidarity in single disputes such as that at BTR, but will take the campaign further. The working class movement will have a clear answer in Britain and in South Africa to people in companies that seek to enslave their class brothers and sisters in that country. Increasingly, that answer will be public ownership, nationalisation and the control and management by workers so that investments that are being used to prop up the racist regime can be turned against it.

Internationalism is not just a moral matter facing British workers. For us, internationalism is summed up in a simple phrase: a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. Trade unions in South Africa are denied the right to organise and workers are paid cheap labour poverty wages of £20 to £25 a week. That means that British firms with factories in Coventry and the midlands and elsewhere in Britain can co-operate in South Africa and play off workers in one country against workers in another.

We in the Labour movement learned early in our history, perhaps as far back as 100 years ago, that where factories were operated up and down Britain and were owned by the same employer, the same gaffer, we could form combines to make sure that our union policies were equal to the joint policies of management. That lesson is being learned internationally, and that is why Transport and General Workers Union members at a Dunlop factory in Leicester donated in recent weeks £200 to the families of strikers in South Africa.

The conditions of black workers in South Africa cannot be summed up in a few phrases. The polarisation caused by apartheid in South Africa has led to the richest 5 per cent. owning 38 per cent. of all personally owned wealth — double the rate in the United States of America. Whites own 98 per cent. of all farms, 93 per cent. of private property, 99 per cent. of quoted shares and 95 per cent. of unquoted shares. That is the society that the Government and the Prime Minister defend.

Britain is South Africa's fourth largest trading partner and that is why the Prime Minister has not even taken up the suggestion of economic sanctions against that country. She has not taken up that suggestion because of the £12 billion worth of British investment in that country and not because of the excuse that she gave to me in the House, that sanctions might affect the lives of 250,000 British workers and threaten their jobs. She does not care for the 2·5 million she has put on the dole in the last seven years. What leads us to believe that she cares for another 250,000 if sanctions were to be employed?

The Prime Minister does not care about a society where one in three black children under the age of 14 are stunted in growth because of malnutrition. In the country that pioneered heart transplants, there is only one doctor to every 174,000 people. Some 11 million blacks are forced to live in the Bantustans, the concentration camps, the so-called homelands.

The Congress of South African Trade Unions is a movement beginning to organise hundreds of thousands, and soon millions, of workers under its banner, and it stands on the Freedom Charter of 1955. That charter offers to the workers and peasants of South Africa the hope that the wealth that only they have created in their country can be fairly and equally divided among them and their families. This debate is about one company, the breaking of the EEC code of conduct by one management, but the surrounding facts and figures of the dispute and the growing power of the trade unions is a warning not just to P. W. Botha but to BTR, to the Minister and to all others in Britain and in South Africa who seek to prop up the hated system of apartheid.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): By raising this subject this evening the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) has given me an opportunity to stress the importance which the Government attach to full compliance by British companies and their South African subsidiaries with the EC code of conduct. It also gives me an opportunity to congratulate the majority of companies on a generally high standard of performance under the code and to thank them for their co-operation in submitting reports to my Department.

However, the hon. Gentleman has made a number of allegations about a particular company. I shall not comment on those, either to agree with them or reject them, because it is our consistent practice not to comment on the performance of individual companies under the code. I shall elaborate on the background to this practice in a moment.

I am naturally aware of the dispute which has arisen between BTR/Sarmcol and the Metal and Allied Workers Union. It has been accompanied at various times by incidents of violence and intimidation. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will join with me in condemning those who seek to pursue their disagreements by such means.

Meanwhile, one can only have sympathy with the plight of the destitute former employees of the company. But this is something which is happening thousands of miles away in another country and ultimately the company and the union must resolve their disagreements directly.

For those reasons, it would not be appropriate or helpful for the Government to intervene with the company. But I remain confident that they will continue actively to seek ways to resolve this dispute. I hope, too, that the hon. Gentleman will urge his contacts in the union to act in a similar manner. I understand that the dispute is to be considered by the industrial court. That is apparently the appropriate forum for the dispute to be considered in at this stage. I believe that it should be given every opportunity to resolve the problems between the company and the union.

The hon. Gentleman has alleged that the company has failed to comply with the EC code of conduct, that it is in breach of the code provisions. The company's report under the code is available for public inspection and it speaks for itself. Members of the House and of the public may judge for themselves whether the hon. Gentleman's allegations against the company are justified or not.

[Mr. Alan Clark]

I recognise that the code encourages companies to ensure that their workers are free to form or join a union. Under the revised code, agreed last year by the EC member states, companies are encouraged to pay particular attention to unions representing black African workers and to be prepared to sign recognition agreements with them. But that does not mean that companies are obliged to recognise unions not representative of their work force or that companies must accept all the conditions which unions may seek to impose. Free collective bargaining has to be free on both sides if it is to have any meaning.

I mentioned that it is not our practice to comment on the performance of individual companies under the EC code. That is a long-standing practice, and there are a number of very good reasons for it. The hon. Gentleman must not expect me to depart from this, either to condemn or praise individual companies. His intention has plainly been more to condemn than to praise. In so doing he ignores the considerable contribution which British and other European subsidiaries in South Africa have made to the advancement of black Africans and to the changing opinions there in favour of fundamental, peaceful change.

My Department produces an annual analysis and summary. The latest, covering the period July 1984 to June 1985, was placed in the Library of the House prior to the Easter recess.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): It is wrong.

Mr. Clark: It has been corrected since. In that document, we list all the companies which have provided reports under the code to the Department, as well as those whose interests are known or believed to warrant a full report but which have declined to submit one. But we do not otherwise consider it appropriate or helpful to single out individual companies and comment on their performances. Our purpose is to give a concise, factual summary of the position emerging from the reports as a whole, drawing attention to the areas where progress has been made in terms of the response of the subsidiaries of British companies to the standards and objectives laid down in the code.

Mr. Caborn rose——

Mr. Clark: The hon. Member for Conventry, South-East has left me little time, and I feel in fairness to the parties to this dispute and the points that he has raised that I should progress in response to his argument as far as I can.

The credibility of the code as a catalyst to promote better conditions and opportunities for black African employees depends heavily on the co-operation of the companies concerned. We should not encourage this if we were to set ourselves up as judge and jury and put individual companies on trial. We and our partners in the EC are clear that the code must remain a voluntary code. We must continue to give companies every encouragement to comply with it on a voluntary basis. The Department's analysis of code returns demonstrates the success which this approach has achieved. Only three companies still decline to submit a report: 98 per cent. of all the companies whom we believe ought to submit reports did so. Our analysis also demonstrates the contribution which these companies, that is, the vast majority of them, are making towards the social and economic advancement of their black African work forces. I shall say more about this in a moment. It is significant that the business sector, both local and European companies, are in the forefront of those in South Africa calling for fundamental reform of the system and the abolition of apartheid.

Mr. Caborn: How the Minister can actually make that statement I do not know. The report, although it was wrong in its compilation, now shows clearly a reduction of 21 per cent. paid below the lower datum line. We are back pre 1979. That is the situation on the code itself.

Mr. Clark: I think the hon. Gentleman was mistaken. What I was drawing the attention of the House to was the high level of companies which are filing reports under the code. There are virtually no exceptions to this. Judgments and assessments about whether or not companies are in breach of code guidelines are unlikely to be simple or clear cut. In an extreme case, the Department might be involved in a risk of legal proceedings if companies sought to contest accusations against them made outside this House.

All the information submitted to the Department about companies' performance is publicly available. Copies of all company reports are available in the Library of both Houses, as well as in the Department's Library and our diplomatic posts in South Africa, where they may be inspected by callers. It is possible for interested members of the public to judge for themselves and to study in detail the records of individual companies in complying with the code.

The companies themselves are also asked to make their reports available. Some of the larger companies publish and distribute their reports widely, attaching considerable importance to the contribution they are making, welcoming the opportunity to publicise it, and accepting a responsibility to give a lead.

The company mentioned by the hon. Member will doubtless take careful note of the points he has made and consider whether or how to respond. The facts about the company's performance under the code are on the record and publicly available in the company's report. Interested shareholders, customers, consumers or members of the public at large may judge for themselves and react as they consider appropriate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS

ULLAPOOL HARBOUR ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Rifkind presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 7 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to Ullapool Harbour; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered upon Tuesday 29th April and to be printed. [Bill 139.]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Caravan Sites Act 1968

1. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to report on possible amendments to the Caravan Sites Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I announced a review of gipsy sites policy on 13 December and asked for comments and suggestions by the end of March. The 60 or so responses are now being examined and I will announce my conclusions as soon as possible.

Mr. Colvin: When trying to solve the difficult problem of finding accommodation for gipsies, which should take priority, the statutory obligation upon councils to provide sites, or local planning policy, which can also be enshrined in a statutory structure document? If the latter takes priority, will my hon. Friend consider the introduction of a plan for private gipsy sites identified by a strengthened Gypsy Council and owned by the gipsies themselves?

Mr. Tracey: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point. Every individual case must be decided on its merits. It may be necessary, on occasions, to accept a gipsy site in an area where restrictive planning policies apply. However, the arguments in favour must be extremely convincing. Private sites can make an important contribution, and this will be considered further in the review that I have announced.

Mr. Steen: Although my hon. Friend recognises the importance of gipsy sites, will he call for a review of tenting and camping sites? Is he aware that the new directions which have been given by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of the Environment put great pressure on land of historic nature and land of outstanding natural beauty, such as the heritage coastline? Will my hon. Friend initiate a review of 28-day licences, whereby camping is allowed without any planning consent?

Mr. Tracey: The question was confined to gipsy sites, which are one of my responsibilities, but I assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and my colleagues at the Department will take his points to heart.

Leasehold Reform

3. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his proposals regarding long leaseholders in blocks of flats.

6. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to extend the rights of private sector tenants in mansion-block flats.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): My right hon. Friend announced in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 8 April that the Government have accepted the main thrust of the recommendations of the Nugee committee on the management of privately owned blocks of flats. We propose to go further by giving a right to consultation on the appointment of managing agents and a right in long leasehold blocks to buy out the landlord's interest if he or she persistently fails in his or her duties. We shall introduce legislation as soon as possible.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Minister aware that many leaseholders are desperate for early legislation? Does "as soon as possible" mean in the next Session? Is the Minister still seeking opinions on the structure of the legislation, or has that process finished?

Mr. Patten: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's comment. I cannot, of course, anticipate the contents of the Queen's Speech of the next Session. Obviously we are seeking the earliest possible legislative opportunity. I remember listening with great interest to the hon. Gentleman's speech on his excellent ten-minute Bill. I would welcome any further observations from the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Members on the contents of our future legislation. I believe that there is cross-party agreement about the need to do something.

Dr. Twinn: I congratulate the Minister and my right hon. Friend on what they have done to extend choice to people who live in flats. Is the Minister aware of the initiative already taken by local Conservative councils which are acting to extend protection to private tenants? Is the Minister aware of the recent agreement made by the Westminster city council with private landlords?

Mr. Patten: Yes. I have just become aware of the agreement between Westminster city council, under its excellent chairman of housing, Councillor Patricia Kirwan, and a good number of private landlords who, on a voluntary code of guidance, anticipate many, if not most, of the things that we hope to indroduce in legislation. I hope that Westminster's lead will be followed by other boroughs and landlords.

Mr. Alan Roberts: Is the Minister aware that many people are at a loss to understand why he has not tabled amendments or new clauses to the Housing and Planning Bill, to implement the recommendations of the Nugee report? If the Minister really wants to do something for leaseholders in blocks of flats, why does he not accept the Opposition amendment? does he not realise that giving leasehold reform legislation to householders in 1965 helped Labour to a landslide victory in 1966?

Mr. Patten: I had completely forgotten that, if I ever knew it. The hon. Gentleman is aware, from his distinguished service on the Housing and Planning Bill in Committee, how many new clauses and amendments have been tabled. I am loth to table any more, especially on such a complex issue. I am unable to accept the Opposition's amendment because they would want us to change legislation by secondary legislation attached to the Housing and Planning Bill. The issue is far too complex for that. There are many legal ramifications. We must have separate legislation.

Mr. John Fraser: May I remind the Minister that the Opposition have offered to give their full co-operation to any legislation which implements the Nugee committee report? May I also remind him that it has been Labour party policy for many years to introduce leasehold enfranchisement on flats along the lines of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. The Labour party's view is now endorsed by the Building Societies Association, the National Consumer Protection Council, the Law Commission and many others. Why do the Government not announce that they are in principle in favour of leasehold enfranchisement for flats, as for houses?

Mr. Patten: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's generous comments about the official Opposition's willingness to collaborate and co-operate with us to ensure that the Nugee recommendations are carried forward into law as soon as possible. We are trying to get after bad, delinquent landlords. We do not want to take rights away from good landlords and good managing agents. There are excellent private landlords and managing agents and we do not want the private rented sector to dry up further. That is doing much harm to housing.

Council House Sales

4. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the provision of an indemnity for council vendors by right to buy purchasers against potential defects in title; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): My hon. Friend has drawn attention to the position of tenants in his constituency who are denied the right to buy their houses because their landlord does not have good title.

I deplore the failure of Bolton borough council to take steps to perfect its title. The provision of an indemnity would not, however, be a solution in those cases where the landlord cannot sell because he does not have the necessary interest in the property.

Mr. Thurnham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that, in many cases, the accepted private sector practice of providing indemnities would be appropriate and helpful?

Sir George Young: Yes, and it would be helpful if Bolton council would offer indemnity when it considers that it has sufficient interest in a property to be able to sell. It would then be for the purchaser to decide whether he was happy to go ahead and buy on the strength of that indemnity.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Can the problems of defects in title relating to the council's responsibility for defects in the property be covered, as many of my constituents are unable to sell houses which they purchased in good faith because they have discovered defects in property which the council formerly owned?

Sir George Young: That is an ingenious diversion from defect in title to defect in property. The House passed the Housing Defects Act 1984, which was intended to tackle the serious problems experienced by many people who in good faith bought from a public body houses which turned out to have defects. The Government are making good progress with implementing that Act.

Mr. Sackville: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents in Bolton are unable to buy their homes, although it is clearly the Government's intention that they should be able to do so? How long will councils such as Bolton be allowed to take advantage of the loophole in the right-to-buy legislation? When will the Government introduce legislation necessary to put that right?

Sir George Young: Many of us heard yesterday the renewed apparent commitment of the Labour party to the right to buy. I wonder whether Opposition spokesmen could now have a word with their opposite numbers in Bolton to see whether that council, which is the only one that I know of which denies the right to buy on this rather flimsy pretext, might change its policy. Legislation is complex, but we have not ruled it out.

Rates

5. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his assessment of the effect of the imposition by local authorities of high rates to finance expenditure above statutory limits upon the local economy and employment; and what steps his Department has taken and is proposing to take to curb high rate rises.

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): I have no doubt that the excessive rates imposed by some councils can have serious consequences for the local economy and for employment opportunities. The rates of the very highest spenders are, and will continue to be, curbed by rate capping. In the longer term, we have published proposal to replace the present rating system in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government".

Mr. Hickmet: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Have not Left-wing authorities such as Liverpool and Lambeth deliberately pursued spending policies that are designed to sabotage local government? Has not that prompted feeble-minded authorities, such as Scunthorpe in my constituency, to overspend to the tune of 46 per cent. and to support Arthur Scargill in his attempt to close down the steelworks in my constituency, with the loss of 10,000 jobs? Does that not indicate the type of spending programmes that Left-wing authorities are prepared to pursue?

Mr. Waldegrave: The first two councils that my hon. Friend mentioned sought conflict for the sake of conflict, regardless of the damage to ratepayers, to local business, or to anybody else. It is noticeable that Scunthorpe is 60 per cent. over the average for shire district councils. For example, it is 162 per cent. over the average in its expenditure on sports and recreation, but I doubt whether its services are 162 per cent. better. There is, therefore, tremendous room for them to make savings and bring practical help to local business.

Mr. O'Brien: Has the Minister made any assessment of the effect of the abolition of the West Yorkshire metropolitan county council on rates in West Yorkshire and of the effect of the reduction in rate support grant, which has led to a substantial increase in the rates that are paid by ratepayers in West Yorkshire? Has the Minister assessed the Government's actions that have caused such high rates in West Yorkshire?

Mr. Waldegrave: I have made a detailed assessment of the fact that the outgoing West Yorkshire metropolitan county council fiddled the books last year and thereby made the rates this year seem much higher. If it had rated at a proper level last year, the rate increases in the successor district councils would have been perfectly reasonable.

Mr. Nicholls: Is my hon. Friend aware of how far that process has gone in the alliance-controlled Devon county council? In the education department alone staffing has been increased by 10 per cent. That has resulted in a rates increase of about 400 per cent., plus loss of grant. That is the price that was demanded for the abolition of the remaining grammar schools. Is my hon. Friend able to imagine what effect that has had on the local economy?

Mr. Waldegrave: One of the most marked effects of having hung councils or, even worse, Liberal-controlled councils — this may be an extraordinary and rather shaming fact for the high spenders on the alliance Benches to have to acknowledge—is that they manage to lose control of expenditure even more effectively than does the Labour party. The facts show that the rate increases in the hung councils and the Liberal councils in the shire counties are higher than the rate increases in both Labour and Conservative-controlled councils.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister accept that he has given a very misleading answer? Calderdale, which is a balanced council, has imposed this year a 41 per cent. rates increase, of which 2 per cent. was charged by Calderdale. The rest was charged by the joint boards and quangos that were set up by the Minister's Department. At the same time, boroughs such as Kensington and Chelsea, which hardly need a reduction, have had a 26 per cent. rates decrease, while people in Hove are paying no rates at all. How can that be a successful product of the Government's new rating policies as they affect the country?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall be canvassing next week in Kensington and Chelsea, and I shall make use of the hon. Gentleman's useful remark that the Liberal party's view is that the rates in Kensington and Chelsea should be increased. It was the creative accounting, to use the technical term, of the outgoing metropolitan counties that caused the problem in Calderdale. The figures show that hung councils and Liberal councils are higher raters than either Labour or Conservative councils. That must be very shaming for the Liberal party.

Mr. Spencer: Is my hon. Friend aware that last year, in its publication "Ratewatch", the CBI said that some councillors were either, at best, ill-informed or, at worst, naive and absurd? In view of the efforts of the Labour-controlled city councils and the alliance and Liberal county councils, which have increased the rates by almost 40 per cent. this year, does he not think that the latter, description is more accurate and that it fully justifies the proposal to have non-domestic rates fixed at national level?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is true that the behaviour of some of these councils is every day making it easier for us to argue that we need the radical reforms that we have put forward.

Mr. Tony Banks: When will the Minister stop using the big lie technique of saying that there is a direct link between rate levels and business failures? The Minister surely knows that the major reasons for business failures in Britain are the state of order books, which depends on the state of the economy, interest rates, and so on. They are all factors that are influenced entirely by Government policies. If the Minister really thinks that there is a direct correlation, why does he not analyse the 7,000 company bankruptcies and the 15,000 liquidations last year to see whether rates were a factor in those failures? If he will not do that, will he start analysing the failures that will continue to flow from Government policies, to see what the correlation is?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is not a very effective representative of the new grey Labour party. The truth is that as a result of Government policies interest rates are now falling and in many areas the unavoidable business cost that is increasing is the business rate. There is no question about that, and I shall be happy to analyse it. Indeed, a number of chambers of commerce and others have sent us good material on the critical effect that rates can have in marginal situations.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend can take heart from the fact that my constituency, which enjoys the highest unemployment and the highest rates in Britain, is looking forward to the day when the Secretary of State rate caps it, or, better still, gets rid of Cleveland county council altogether. That has no friends in my constituency.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have to disappoint my hon. Friend. At the moment we have no further proposals for local government reorganisation to put before the House, although there are some in Bristol who feel about the county seat of Avon as my hon. Friend does about Cleveland county council. My hon. Friend is right. In the short term the best thing to do is to get a Conservative council back to bring effective help to local businesses.

Mr. Straw: Why does the Minister not have the guts to admit that rates have risen by three times the level of inflation this year and twice the level of inflation in the seven years of Conservative Government because of the £17·5 billion cumulative cuts in rate support grant for which the Government are responsible? Does he not understand that it is an outrageous slur against the outgoing councillors of West Yorkshire to suggest now what he has never suggested in the past 12 months, that rates have gone up in West Yorkshire by 28·3 per cent. because of some kind of fiddling by them. Rates have gone up in West Yorkshire, the West Midlands, Tyne and Wear, South

Yorkshire, Merseyside, Greater Manchester, and in Conservative shire counties by 17·6 per cent., because of the Government's policies in cutting the rate support grant.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. In two of the ex-metropolitan county areas in particular—Merseyside and West Yorkshire—a critical factor in the high rates this year was creative accounting by outgoing councils. This is not the first time that I have said what I did today about West Yorkshire. I have repeated it on many occasions because it is true. The hon. Gentleman tries, as usual, to obfuscate the issue. The fact is that Labour authorities mean higher spending. I regret that we are seeing an increase in real terms in expenditure in many Labour authorities and, I fear, a few Conservative authorities. That is why the rates are increasing so much.

Nuclear Waste

8. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have had a wide range of representations, from hon. Members and others, mostly concerning the recent announcement of alternative possible sites for the disposal of low-level and short-lived intermediate level wastes.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Given the immense and proper concern about nuclear waste disposal, will the Minister give us two undertakings: first, that the Select Committee's report will be debated before the orders are laid; and, secondly, that the debate on the Select Committee's report will not be regarded as the debate on the orders themselves?

Mr. Waldegrave: Those matters are obviously for consideration by my right hon. and hon. Friends, and I am sure that they will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Michael Brown: I thank my hon. Friend for visiting my constituency on Monday morning. In connection with the representations to which he referred in answer to the question from the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), will he confirm that many of those representations come from South Killingholme and from my constituency? Will he urge his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to give serious consideration to the point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West about the need for a debate on the Select Committee report? Does my hon. Friend stand by his parliamentary answer to me when he said that he would lay the special development order before the end of April, as that is nine days away?

Mr. Waldegrave: I confirm that the point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) was also made to me by my hon. Friend and by many of those whom I met during the enjoyable but anxious day that I spent on Humberside. As for my hon. Friend's latter point, I cannot yet give him the exact date on which the special development order will be laid, but I hope that there will be no undue delay about that.

Mr. Frank Cook: I thank the Minister for the courtesy that he showed last week in forwarding to me on publication the report made on the contribution of nuclear establishments to acid deposition, which reported that the degree of deposition was practically nil. Can he therefore understand the astonishment that I felt when I saw the minutes of the Dungeness local liaison committee meeting of 6 December 1985, which reported on the Central Electricity Generating Board's proposals to strip Magnox cladding from fuel rods, to dissolve that cladding in acid and to dispose of the sludge directly into the sea? Will the Minister explain how that process was licensed and why it was started? How can he square the open proposals to have dry storage at Trawsfynydd with the covert proposals to pollute the ocean?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's first point about the contribution by nuclear power stations to the acid rain problem. The research has shown that that is not a problem. The CEGB proposals to which the hon. Gentleman referred would proceed only if the sludge came within the existing authorisation which my Department laid down for that power station. If that technique is to be used, it would have to be used within the existing authorisation so there would be no significant addition to the amount of radioactivity in the sea.

Mr. Hickmet: Will the Select Committee's report be debated before the special development order is laid? If not, why not?

Mr. Waldegrave: I cannot yet give a clear answer to my hon. Friend on that point.

Dr. Cunningham: Does the Minister accept that the Labour party would like a debate on the report of the Select Committee on the Environment on this matter? Is it not clear that the useful life of the Drigg disposal site in my constituency is quickly coming to an end and that it is a national requirement that an alternative site for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste should be found? Is it true that most people believe—and I hope that the Government accept—that the discharge of low-level waste to the marine environment should be abolished, not increased? Why will the Government not set a target date now for the abolition of discharges to the Irish sea and impose an annual reduction on those discharges until that target is met? In that connection, it must be foolish to agree that the CEGB should dispose of additional waste from Dungeness. No such authorisation should be granted.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have had only a brief opportunity to study the hon. Gentleman's last point, but I believe that no new authorisation would be needed, as it would be within the existing authorisation. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's first point. Some people see a great extension of Drigg as being the way to solve all the problems. I do not believe that that is so. If, as some people say, there were to be intense compaction of waste, which would then be deposited at Drigg, Drigg would have to take more radioactivity than should properly be posited there. The Government agree on that point.

There is a steady diminution in the amount of radioactive material that is placed at sea. We are now putting to sea a tenth of what was being deposited 10 years ago, and in 10 years' time we shall be depositing only a tenth of that. That is steady progress. I think that there will always be some trivial outputs to the sea from Sellafield, but our objective is to reduce the level to the best in the world, which is at Cap la Hague.

Rates

9. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the loss of revenue incurred by local authorities due to the late setting of rates; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): All rating authorities in England had set a rate for 1986-87 by 1 April 1986. It is for the independent district auditor to decide whether losses arose and, if so, to what extent, in those authorities which delayed setting a rate for 1985-86.

Mr. Howells: Does the Minister agree that five London boroughs have lost a total income of over £100 million this year because of the late setting of rates? What plans has she to inform the electorate before the May elections of this loss?

Mrs. Rumbold: I cannot confirm or deny the figures that the hon. Gentleman has given, as it is a matter entirely for the local district auditors to determine and then to report.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend agree that the behaviour of Left-wing Labour councils in failing to set a rate until the last minute was a breach of statutory duty? Can she estimate the amount of lost revenue in interest and say when the district auditors will be brought in, which should act as a preventive measure for any other local authorities which fail to behave in a decent and civilised way?

Mrs. Rumbold: I commend my hon. Friend for his continued attack upon the extravagance and nonsensical waste that has been a feature of the councils within his constituency. The district auditors, however, have to take these decisions for themselves, as the Secretary of State has no powers to direct them.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister aware of the chaos that will ensue, and the impact that it will have on London boroughs, if about 200 councillors find themsleves disqualified through the actions of the district auditor? Will the Minister make it quite clear to the district auditor, who I assume is always a Tory stooge and not independent, that such chaos should not be visited upon London local government structures?

Mrs. Rumbold: It is disgraceful to say that the district auditor or any other person who is appointed independently is a Tory anything. It is especially disgraceful to allege that he will be a stooge. Councillors have been disqualified quite properly because of their squalid actions and disregard of a law that has been established for some considerable time, well before the arrival of the Government. The actions of these councillors means that they have brought disqualification upon themselves. It is for the electors of the district and borough councils to pass judgment on them on 8 May, which I hope they will do.

Rural Environment

10. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he intends to take to protect the rural environment; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Kenneth Baker): We have decided to support the Broads Bill and to extend the landscape areas special development order to cover the design, appearance and siting of farm and forestry buildings and roads in all national parks. The House will be aware of my various statements about the importance of preserving the green belt.

Mr. Adley: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. I thank him also for what has been a perceived and noticeable change of attitude on the part of his Department towards the protection of the environment over the past few months. Will he accept from me that if the Government fail to recognise the rising tide of anger that is felt when many local authority planning decisions are overthrown by his Department, the Government will reap a whirlwind and will deserve everything that they get?

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. I assure him that I consider that the protection of the countryside is one of my major responsibilities. We have a uniquely beautiful inheritance in the English countryside which we must cherish and protect.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the increasing concern that is being expressed in rural areas about the insensitive planting of coniferious trees and the effect that it is having on fishing interests and on acid ground water levels, which are destroying spawning beds and the fish population and having a considerable impact on the environment and the rural economy?

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to a Scottish Member for drawing this to my attention, but it is not an exclusively Scottish problem, because there have been quite large plantings of what are virtually conifer forests in the south of England and I and my colleagues are having a look at the effect of that.

Mr. David Clark: As the Government now appear to have conceded that acid rain from British power stations is causing damage [illegible] Scandinavian neighbours, will the right hon. Gentleman also accept that those same emissions are causing great damage to our own United Kingdom environment, with the result that we have dead lochs in Galloway, dying lakes in Cumbria and waterways in central Wales which can no longer support fish? Will he accept his responsibility and take some action to reduce the level of acidic emissions and thus try to protect a little more our precious British countryside?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman, who follows these matters very closely, will know that there is a complicated causal link between the emissions from factories and the increase in acidity of lakes and damage to forests. I would only point out—and I think that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to recognise this—that in our country we have a very good record of reducing the sulphur dioxide and nitric oxide emissions from heavy plants. In fact, we have reduced them by over 40 per cent.

Mr. Chapman: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to the protection of the green belts, which is surely the best way to protect 4·5 million acres of England's countryside. Will he accept the thanks of many environment organisations for accepting an amendment to the Housing and Planning Bill that will ensure that simplified planning zones cannot be set up in green belts, national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty and, of course, green belt conservation areas?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is correct to say that in the amendments to the Housing and Planning Bill we have made it clear that simplified zones will not be applied in the areas that he has mentioned. I believe that there is widespread agreement in the House on the importance of preserving the green belt, which is one of the most successful planning inventions of this century. It was devised in Britain and green belts now extend to some 4·5 million acres. In fact, we have doubled the size of green belts since 1979.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

12. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Birmingham city council regarding the privatisation of water authorities.

Mr. John Patten: None.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that Birmingham city council, which invested in reservoirs in Wales during the last century and was perfectly happy to see those assets managed by a public authority—in this case the Welsh water authority—is not happy to see those assets sold to line the pockets of the Government's friends and that it is demanding compensation — either £270 million in compensation or a portion of Wales, the Elan valley? Which will the Government give to it?

Mr. Patten: I have already made it clear that I have received no representations from Birmingham. I think that the habit of answering hypothetical questions about hypothetical representations is rather a bad one.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Perhaps I might ask an unhypothetical question. Bearing in mind that the citizens of Birmingham spent millions of pounds on acquiring this water system and buying 43,000 acres of land, does my hon. Friend not think that there should be some system of compensation, since we gave to what we thought was a public authority? Is we are to sell and to privatise, which may be a good policy, why should Birmingham not get back some of the money of which it was deprived some years ago?

Mr. Patten: I do not think that I should break the habit of not answering hypothetical questions, even from my hon. Friend, but perhaps I could answer another question which was implicit in what he said. In 1973 the Water Act vested the ownership of the assets and the debts of water authorities in the water authorities. They have, therefore, become public corporations answerable to the Government.

Mr. Wigley: The Minister should be aware that Brimingham corporation has passed a resolution on this matter. Over the years Birmingham has shamelessly exploited Welsh water resources and is able to sell water to its own citizens at half the price at which the same water is available in Wales. It is totally unacceptable that Birmingham corporation should now go on a rampage, grabbing land in Wales, in total opposition to the wishes of the Welsh people.

Mr. Patten: We are absolutely against shameless exploitation. Under water privatisation we shall ensure that the director general of whatever we end up calling it will have the power to make sure that bulk transfers from one water authority to another under a privatised regime are properly paid for and properly accounted for.

Mr. Forth: May I tell my hon. Friend that I am a Birmingham ratepayer, and that as such I welcome the proposals to privatise the water industry? I hope that Birmingham's residents and water users will benefit from the Government's privatisation proposals and will be able to shop around for the best deal available for the supply of water.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. Privatisation will bring many advantages to the consumer.

Mr. Boyes: Birmingham city council has passed a resolution deploring the privatisation of water authorities and if—I stress the word if—that anti-social policy is carried out, the ratepayers of Birmingham should be fully compensated. A number of other authorities are in a similar position. Water authorities are public assets, not state assets. The Government have no economic, political, legal or moral right to sell assets which they do not own, estimated to be worth £27 billion, to their friends in the City at knockdown prices.

Mr. Patten: I have already explained the legal position. It is that the Water Act 1973 transferred the ownership of the previous assets and the liability of previous debts to the water authorities. Those water authorities became public corporations answerable to the Government. In the privatisation of the water authorities we shall follow the precedent set in the privatisation of British Telecom and British Gas and turn the water authorities into Crown companies. Ownership of assets and liability for debts will be taken on by those Crown companies prior to the successful eventual flotation that will do so much for the consumer.

Mr. Gow: What steps were taken by the Labour party when it was in government, as it is apparently so dissatisfied with the Water Act 1973, to amend that Act so as to frustrate the excellent purpose that is in the mind of my hon. Friend?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend did a great deal for the water industry when he was a Minister in the Department of the Environment, and he has put his finger exactly and precisely on the point. The Labour Government did nothing at all.

Rates

13. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average weekly domestic rate bill in April 1979 and in April 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: It was £3 in April 1979 and £7·70 in April 1986.

Mr. Litherland: Does the Minister agree that those figures show the effect of the Government's vicious cuts on local authorities? Those cuts are estimated at £1 million a week in Manchester, and that means that the ratepayer has to pay more for fewer services. Perhaps Government Ministers would like to come and canvass in Manchester. There would not be a hung council there, but there would probably be a few hanged Ministers because of what the Government are doing to that area.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am interested to learn from the hon. Gentleman that services in Manchester have been reduced, because the real term increase has been in the region of 9 per cent. If local authorities had looked at and obeyed the guidelines set out by the Government year after year for rate increases, they would have been able not only to help their ratepayers but to provide perfectly adequate services.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that the rate increase over the last seven years, whatever its cause, is a substantial burden on the domestic ratepayer? Will she take every opportunity to make it clear to the electorate that our is the only party that is prepared to lift this burden?

Mrs. Rumbold: What my hon. Friend says is true. In all instances of carefully managed and well-run Conservative authorities the ratepayers have been the beneficiaries. Sadly, that has not been the case in authorities controlled by Labour or by the Liberal/SDP alliance. Ratepayers can feel safe only under the Conservatives.

Mr. Clelland: Notwithstanding what the Minister said about the Government's policy towards rate increases, does she accept that local authorities have been able to maintain their services over the years only by using creative accountancy methods? Those methods are now running out, as evidenced by the horrendous rate rises that have had to be imposed in Gateshead to maintain services at a high level. Does she accept that only creative accountancy and not the Government's policies have enabled us to maintain a high level of services?

Mrs. Rumbold: No, I do not accept that. Sadly, creative accountancy will not protect ratepayers from the extravagances of authorities which use such procedures. It will not be long before those authorities—and they are mostly Labour-controlled—which have used creative accountancy will find that their ratepayers will, sadly, have to pay the bill.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend aware that her figure for this year will include the 26 per cent. rate increase put through by the Lib-Lab pact running Somerset county council? That increase is mostly due to increased expenditure. Does she agree that it makes life very difficult for ratepayers and businesses, and blows sky-high the pretence that the Opposition parties are seriously interested in solving unemployment?

Mrs. Rumbold: I agree with my hon. Friend. Those who are anxious to create businesses find it devastating to have to contend with such rate increases.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Is it not relevant to ask how much of the weekly domestic rate bill is attributable to the late setting of rates last year? That figure can now be worked out. A private letter has been sent by the district auditor to the chief executives of the offending London boroughs. The information should be made public. The figures show that one borough suffered a £50 million loss. My borough of Southwark lost £25 million [Interruption.] Other boroughs have figures that are not much lower. Will the Minister make the figures known so that the ratepayers can judge?

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Gentleman is sightly confused. I say only "slightly confused", which is a great tribute to him. He knows perfectly well that the facts that he wants will be examined by the district auditor, and will be made known as and when those councils which receive such figures have studied them and made them known to their electorates.

Local Authority Capital Receipts

14. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the proposed level of capital receipts which local authorities will be permitted to use on building work in the financial year 1986-87.

Mrs. Rumbold: I announced in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moyniham) on 20 November, at column 246, that there will be no changes for 1986-87 in the prescribed proportion of capital receipts which local authorities may use for additional capital expenditure.

Mr. Latham: Following the chink of hope in the speech yesterday of my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction, will my hon. Friend consider whether she can loosen the purse strings to some extent in the forthcoming year to help a new improvement grant programme? Even raising the figure to 25 per cent. would be agreat help.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand why my hon. Friend has asked that question, but he will be aware that it is not possible for me to pre-empt the decisions for next year to be taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. However, we are considering new proposals for capital expenditure generally. It may well be that my hon. Friend's representations will be taken into account.

Mr. Loyden: Given the needs of many of our major cities, what justification do the Government have for imposing constraints on local authorities and for not allowing them to use their resources to solve the many problems that exist?

Mrs. Rumbold: Given the way in which Liverpool city council has generally managed its affairs, it is hard to imagine that it would manage greater receipts any better than it has administered any money that has come into its hands. I feel very sorry and sad for the people of Liverpool.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend agree that most local authorities have played the game by selling council houses in accordance with this Government's policy and wish? The Labour party has now taken that policy on board — [Interruption.] Well, the Labour party might take it on board. Should not local authorities gain some reward in the form of a relaxation in the amount of money that they can spend on the improvement grant system?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend knows that the Labour party is simply saying that it will adopt our very successful policy of council house sales. Whether or not that is to be believed is a matter for speculation. As for capital receipts, half a billion pounds extra in capital receipts came into play during the course of this financial year, and authorities are able to spend a proportion of that towards their allocation.

Mr. John Fraser: Can the Minister deny the rumours that are beginning to circulate to the effect that the Government are about to impose either a moratorium or a restriction on capital expenditure by local authorities later this year? Will the Government give a clear instruction to the London Residuary Body that the £39 million of capital receipts, which are legally — and certainly morally — due to London authorities which have ex-GLC estates, will be disbursed to those boroughs and not given to some Tory boroughs, which make no contribution to London's housing problems?

Mrs. Rumbold: It seems that the Labour party is consumed with the local elections on 8 May. I must say on both counts that the hon. Gentleman is indulging in scaremongering.

Housing Investment Programme

15. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify separate housing investment allocations for works to new town dwellings; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No; separate allocations of this kind would deny the councils in question the freedom to decide their own priorities in the use of the total amounts of housing investment resources which can be made available to them.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware of the serious situation facing some towns, not least Peterlee, in my own constituency? In view of the answers that he has given, may I assure him that Peterlee would be prepared to sacrifice some of the freedom to which he referred if it could get a few more million pounds? How can the Government honour their commitment to new towns without having separate identifiable allocations within the housing investment programme? Will he say how Easington district council can meet the £40 million repairs needed in Peterlee with the allocation of £7·5 million that is being granted by the Government?

Sir George Young: I well remember the issues, because I negotiated the memorandum with the local authorities concerned. The memorandum said that local authorities should draw the attention of my Department to the bid for the expenditure on remedial work which had been accepted for grants, so that in its turn the Department could ensure that those needs were reflected in the allocations. For the year 1986-87 we took account of the expenditure implications facing the hon. Gentleman's local authority regarding the stock that it inherited from new towns. I cannot see how separate identification could make the problem any easier. The local authority has flexibility already, if it wishes to supplement its resources, to spend more on the new town dwellings. I have sympathy with the problem, and I will see whether I can help in the forthcoming negotiations for next year's allocations.

Rate Support Grant

16. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes announcing the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend hopes to be able to announce the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 in about the middle of November 1986, about a month earlier than in recent years.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister acknowledge that the massive reductions in rate support grant have led to large rate increases in places such as Bradford, where the Conservative-Liberal alliance has increased rates by 30 per cent.? Will he also take this opportunity to apologise for the slur on the West Yorkshire county council that he made just now, suggesting that it fiddled the books last year? Will he also give a clear assurance that when the grant is announced there will be no further stealing of resources by central Government from hard-pressed local authorities, which are desperately trying to meet the urgent social needs in their areas?

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that I would probably be insulting those outgoing Labour councillors if I apologised. I am sure that they regarded their manoeuvres as being thoroughly successful. Their objective was to put up the rates for successor authorities, and they did it. Then, Parliament did not allow us to prevent such things happening, as we did not have the powers to control the councils in the outgoing year. Such manoeuvres were, I am afraid, inevitable. They have been disastrously brought home in the West Yorkshire area.

Mr. Watts: In setting the rate support grant settlement for next year, no doubt my right hon. Friend will have in mind the problems of the shire counties. May I ask whether he shares my dismay that so many of the shire counties, which bleated so loudly about loss of grant this year, have chosen not to pass on the benefits of guaranteed recycling of grant to ratepayers, thereby inflicting on ratepayers much higher levels of rate increase than were otherwise necessary?

Mr. Waldegrave: If they did not pass it on this year, they have it in the balance for next year. I am sure that many councils will take account of that in due course. More important, my right hon. Friend has heard what my hon. Friend said about the shire counties. The whole process of consultation will begin soon in the normal way.

Dr. Cunningham: Is it not clear to anyone who examines the position that the biggest single reason why rates have increased for all authorities has been the seven successive reductions in rate support grant, enforced as a deliberate policy by the Government, resulting in a cumulative loss to local authorities in excess of £17·5 billion? Will the Minister accept that his right hon. Friend's claim—it is noticeable that the Secretary of State has ducked all these issues today — in the newspapers yesterday that average rateable values are what count to those who have to pay rates is a charade? It is rate bills that count to people faced with these problems, and average weekly rate bills have risen under this Government from £2·98 per week to £7·70 per week. Is that not why the chairman of the Conservative party is running scared about the local elections on 8 May, when the Tory party will get a pasting? Is tnat not why he is blaming poor people for the coming defeat and suggesting that it is because poorer people do not support the Government that they will lose? They will certainly lose, but on the basis of the electorate as a whole.

Mr. Waldegrave: If I may interrupt the hon. Member's not very brilliant hustings speech for a moment, would he like to tell the House straightforwardly on which tax — income tax or VAT — the £4 billion or more additional grant that he is pledging to give back to local authorities will fall? Will it go on to the basic rate, or is it, along with the other £25 billion additional expenditure, to go on all taxes and interest rates? In due course the good friend of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), the good doctor in the International Monetary Fund, will return to give them the bill once again.

Mr. Greenway: Would my hon. Friend like to come, and invite the Opposition spokesman to come with him, into the real world at Witton avenue east in Conservative-controlled Ealing, where he will find that the rates are half what they are on the opposite side of the road, which has been in Labour-controlled Brent for umpteen years? Will my hon. Friend remind the Opposition spokesman, and every voter, that the Labour party, when it took over the GLC in 1981, doubled the rates at the same time as it doubled fares for Londoners?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. Indeed, Ealing must be defined as the centre of the real world. There can be no doubt at all—it seems disingenuous of the Labour party even to try to deny it—that Labour is the party of high spending, and therefore of high taxing and high rating. It would be more honourable of the Labour party to fight openly on that platform — an honourable and ancient platform of that party, on which it normally loses — rather than to try to obfuscate the issue.

Publicly Owned Land (Northern Region)

18. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many areas of publicly owned land in the northern region are currently unused or underdeveloped.

Mr. John Patten: On 1 April 1986 the registers of unused and underused publicly owned land in the northern region held 935 sites totalling 12,613 acres, which is far too much.

Mr. Fallon: Is that not an appalling waste of development potential in the north? Will my hon. Friend confirm that he will not hesitate to use his powers to compel local councils to release land that is urgently needed for better housing, jobs and commercial development?

Mr. Patten: Yes, Sir, we shall use those powers. We are doing so increasingly in places such as Darlington and Sunderland. It distresses me very much when local councillors come on delegations to the Department of the Environment to ask for more money, when they are doing so little with the land that councils own and occupy. I do not know what the Labour party's attitude is to derelict and unused land. It is probably as ambivalent as its attitude to the right to buy, so brilliantly summed up yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, when he said that the Labour party's attitude to buying was, "Yes, if you want to buy your council home you may, but if the council wants to stop you buying its council home, it can do that as well."

Mr. Eastham: In Manchester, a 23-acre prime site was sold off to private developers, changing hands three times and stood derelict for 15 years until finally the local authority had to buy it and develop it for the G-MEX exhibition hall. Is that the kind of thing the Minister would really applaud?

Mr. Patten: The G-MEX exhibition hall was funded with Government and European money, as the hon. Gentleman knows. Manchester is sitting on far too much land. It should be getting rid of it in the interests of its ratepayers.

Local Government Reform

19. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes meeting representatives of voluntary organisations to discuss future funding arrangements following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend met representatives of voluntary organisations on 24 March to discuss this. The London Voluntary Service Council telephoned my Department yesterday to seek a further meeting, and it will be meeting my officials tomorrow.

Mr. Park: Is the Minister aware that voluntary bodies engaged in worthwhile projects are being wound up because district councils cannot fund them? Will he consider, in advance of the Widdicombe report, increasing the section 137 money from 2p to 4p so that the new responsibilities can be met?

Sir George Young: My Department is awaiting the report of the Widdicombe inquiry with bated breath. We understand that it is not far away. When we have the report, we will be able to decide on the 2p rate under section 137.

Mr. O'Brien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Arising out of questions?

Mr. O'Brien: Yes. Will you, Mr. Speaker, uphold the dignity and decorum of the Chamber by asking the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government either to substantiate what he said about the outgoing West Yorkshire county councillors——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that answers to supplementary questions from the Front Bench are not a matter for me.

Foreign Affairs Council

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the meeting of Foreign Ministers of the Twelve that took place in Luxembourg on 21 April, and the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council which followed on 21 and 22 April. My hon. Friend the Minister of State—the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker)—and I attended.

The meeting of Foreign Ministers concentrated on the urgent problem of Libya. We had already agreed in the emergency meetings on 14 and 17 April on the importance of taking effective collective action to prevent further acts of Libyan state-directed terrorism and to defend ourselves against the threat. We agreed on 21 April to the following series of measures to this end: a severe cut in the size of people's bureaux throughout the Community; confining members of those bureaux to the city where they are officially assigned; restricting the size of other official Libyan bodies to the minimum necessary for their stated business; applying a much stricter visa regime to Libyans; and ensuring that any Libyan expelled from one member state will be expelled from the Community as a whole.

The Twelve also reaffirmed their ban on arms sales to Libya, and will be pressing other countries to join it. They agreed to look urgently at further action on the abuse of diplomatic immunity. Interior Ministers of the Twelve will be meeting today in the TREVI group to concert the closest possible co-operation between Interior Ministers, the police and security services of the Twelve. Transport Ministers have been asked to step up their co-operation urgently on aviation security. We shall follow up all these decisions urgently with our partners.

To have achieved an effective package of measures against Libya, in force throughout the Community, is a considerable step forward. We shall continue to press for further action and for vigorous implementation of the programme of action now agreed.

The Foreign Affairs Council briefly reviewed the issues likely to be discussed at the Tokyo economic summit. Ministers discussed improvements to the Community's mandate for the negotiations with Mediterranean third countries on the adaptation of their co-operation and association agreements to take account of the accession of Spain and Portugal.

There was a brief discussion of the new Community/Thailand manioc agreement; this is expected to be formally agreed at another Council in the near future. The Council also reviewed and confirmed the position to be adopted by the Community at the ACP-EC Council of Ministers which begins in Barbados on 26 April.

The Council discussed the complaint of the United States about trade loss as a result of the enlargement of the Community. It reconfirmed the Community's readiness to settle the issue in early GATT negotiations and agreed a mandate for the Commission to conduct those negotiations. Ministers regretted the United States' intention to take unilateral retaliatory action and noted that the Community would be bound to take equivalent measures to defend its interests

The Council reviewed progress on implementation of the report of the People's Europe Committee and agreed to adopt the Council of Europe flag for use on appropriate occasions. No requirements are placed on member states by this agreement.

There was an exchange of views on the budgetary situation. It will now be for the Council of Finance Ministers, meeting on 28 April, to consider in detail the 1986 budgetary situation and the 1987 reference framework for expenditure.

That, too, will clearly be an important meeting.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I notice that the Foreign Secretary has described the decision of the European Council as a step forward. The last position from which we were said to be stepping forward was described by the right hon. and learned Gentleman as "vigorous and appropriate" and by the Prime Minister as "passive and supine". Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us how far these decisions represent a step forward, and from what base?

Secondly, why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not press on his colleagues some economic or financial sanctions such as the withdrawal of export credit —[Interruption.] In answer to the supine intervention of some anonymous hon. Member on the Government Benches I would point out that the financial sanctions against Iran that followed the taking of the American hostages proved to play a major role in securing their release. The Libyan situation is not dissimilar in many respects.

Thirdly, I understand, although the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not mention the point, that the Council agreed to send missions to the United States, the non-aligned countries, the Arab world and Libya to explain its position. When will those missions leave? How will they be composed? Precisely what position will they be explaining?

Fourthly, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us anything about the effect on British trade with the Arab world of the decision taken by Her Majesty's Government? Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates have already cancelled visits to Britain to discuss the increase of trade, and I understand that the American company AT and T has decided not to participate in an electronics fair in Britain for fear of terrorist action against it, following the British decision.

Finally, why is the right hon. and learned Gentleman so supine in responding to the American position on all those issues? We know now that 21¼ tonnes of C4 plastic explosive were exported from the United States to Libya by an ex-CIA agent. Only a few ounces of that explosive were required to blow up the TWA aircraft recently. We have heard this morning that the United States has discovered an arms ring operating in America which was planning to export over $2 billion of fighter aircraft, tanks and missiles to Iran and terrorist organisations via Israel. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman discuss with his colleagues the part played in that operation by citizens of the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy and Greece?

As President Reagan is still threatening further action of the same nature as last week's against states that he regards as fostering terrorism, could the right hon. and learned Gentleman make it clear to his Common Market colleagues that Her Majesty's Government will not again act as a Trojan horse of the United States by authorising the use of RAF bases without bothering to find out what specific targets are to be attacked, and with what weapons? If not, did he propose to his Common Market colleagues that the European Community flag should be the stars and stripes?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: So far as flags are concerned, I was content to endorse the sensible proposition that on European occasions the Council of Europe flag should be worn—should be displayed. [Laughter.] I contrast that with the reported attitude of the Opposition, who although the red flag has been their banner for as long as man can remember, are now attempting to conceal that banner in an attempt to mislead the people.

The right hon. Gentleman asked a range of fanciful questions. He must try to restrain his enthusiasm for new epithets when he finds them. The word "supine" has been over-used in his vocabulary.

The substance of the information disclosed today, stopping short of the right hon. Gentleman's fanciful ramblings, is that action is being taken by the authorities in the United States against a conspiracy for the export of arms to illegal destinations. That is something we should applaud and endorse. That is all there is to be said about the matter.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I made plain in the House last week, any question of further action by the United States would be a matter for separate consideration in quite separate circumstances when and if it did arise.

I shall now deal with the substance of what the right hon. Gentleman asked. The reaction of many countries in the Arab world has been a great deal more understanding than many people at first thought of the horror with which the Western democracies react against sustained Libyan state-directed terrorism. The Saudi business mission to which the right hon. Gentleman referred is in the country at present.

The issue of economic sanctions has been dealt with frequently. Experience of the cases in which they have been used previously shows that they have not proved to be an effective weapon. They cannot even be regarded as decisive in the case of Iran.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a step forward. As a result of the meeting this week, there was agreement throughout the Community on the wide range of measures I told the House about in my original statement. That represents a significant advance, as can be evidenced by the reaction of Libya to what has already been done.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many of us will feel that he has been excessively charitable in his statement today towards our EEC partners? It is quite clear from the bland communiqué that came out of Luxembourg that very little has been achieved. Furthermore, it is not likely that there will be any EEC unity in taking action against state-sponsored terrorism.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that my hon. Friend needs to keep a balance in assessing these matters. Plainly, we would have wished for a firmer and more united response from our European partners at an earlier stage. Having said that, the range of measures on which agreement was reached at the meeting on Monday represents a significant advance. It represents a commitment by 12 member states of the European community to take action across the Community, which is manifestly producing a reaction in Libya itself.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Do not the Americans have a legitimate complaint that we have been very slow in Europe in taking concerted action against Libyan-inspired terrorism? Does not the Foreign Secretary find it disturbing that even the sadly limited measures agreed yesterday had to follow in the wake of the American bombing raid? Will the Foreign Secretary remind the House of the terms of the Government's 1985 defence White Paper, which called for a more cohesive Europe operating on equal terms with the United States of America? If that is to be achieved, will he remind his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that that must mean a greater unity of purpose in both economic and political issues with our European partners than has been generally shown by the Government so far?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Although I am not prepared to accept the rebuke with which the right hon. Gentleman closed his question, I plainly endorse the need for more effective European co-operation. That is why this country promoted the political co-operation treaty which we are discussing later today. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman. We have been in the van in pressing our European partners for collective effective action for some time. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) must stop his supine interjections.

Mr. Healey rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman must remember that I am answering a question from another right hon. Gentleman, and even he does not have the right to intervene on that.

Two years ago, we had our experience with the Libyan people's bureau. Since that time, at international gatherings of the Seven, the Ten, or the Twelve of the Council of Europe we have been pressing for effective action. We got a plain agreement in January this year on, for example, a ban on arms sales and an urgent study of further steps—not enough. On Monday 14 April we pressed again for further action and got a commitment to three steps—not enough, but we were in the van the whole time. This Monday we got a commitment to the steps I have described in the House today. That is still not enough, but it is substantial progress; let us be thankful for it.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that we are very pleased that, with his usual determination, he is making steady progress? Does he take comfort from the speech by Chancellor Kohl in the Bundestag stressing that Europe must act against terrorism? Does he believe that he is a substantial ally in this fight?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I acknowledge with gratitude the tribute paid to me by my hon. Friend. It is reminiscent of one of my more fortunate school reports. I endorse what my hon. Friend has said. The Chancellor of the Federal Republic is giving substantial support for effective action. We must continue to press for it ourselves.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Did the Foreign Secretary emphasise to our friends in Europe yesterday, as strongly as the Prime Minister did to the House, that the Americans had a free right to choose which weapon systems were used in the attack on Libya? Did he mention to our European colleagues that the Prime Minister did not deny that those aeroplanes could have carried nuclear weapons?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is a fanciful proposition. It is perfectly plain that the exchanges between the British Government and the United States Government laid down the nature of the targets that were permissible and laid down that the attacks should be undertaken in a fashion that limited collateral damage and civilian casualties on the ground. There was no question of any use of nuclear weapons. To introduce it into this context is fanciful and ridiculous.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that exports of cheap food from the European Community to Libya have been banned? Will he admit that, in view of the way things have gone—he said that the measures did not go far enough—it is no surprise that the Americans took the action they did? Does he consider that the measures which he has just announced are too little and and too late?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have made it perfectly plain that the perception of this matter on both sides of the Atlantic was bound to be influenced by what was happening on the other side. Obviously, there was a connection between the slow reaction of the European Community to Libyan terrorism and the view taken by the United States. For that reason, I have pressed for a more effective response by Europe. As a result, we have been able to get a more effective answer than previously.

As to food surpluses, last week I raised with the Commission our concern about any action to authorise subsidies for dairy exports to Libya and other countries. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister confirmed that to the House yesterday. The latest information I have from the Commission is that no further subsidised dairy sales are in prospect. There is no question of any special benefits or concessions for Libya alone.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): What about beef?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The beef may be from Scotland, and that would be of interest to the hon. Gentleman. He has a special insight into the problem. The choice of export destinations for produce such as beef and cereals is a matter for individual traders. Community export refunds are available for a wide range of destinations. The refunds are designed to bridge the gap between the local price and the world price. Libya has not benefited from any special treatment. The Commission is clear about our concern that that should not happen.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): In view of the German police investigations into the bombing of the disco in Berlin and the British police investigations into the El Al incident, will the Foreign Secretary tell us, at the earliest possible opportunity, whether there is a link between Libya and the El Al incident? If such a link is established, will action be taken by the European Community and other countries to stop flights into Libya as one of the least possible sanctions that must be taken if the European Community and others are to be taken seriously?

Will the Foreign Secretary take the opportunity to reply to a queston that was raised in debate, because the Secretary of State for Defence said elsewhere that Britain did not agree to each specific target? The fact is that the Government did not appear to know or to question the Americans about the targets in Tripoli.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: On the last point, I can simply repeat what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House at the time. The clearest possible response was given to the United States about the nature of targets that could be involved—targets demonstrably connected with the promotion or control of terrorism. The attacks should be undertaken with the highest possible regard to the avoidance of casualties — civilian or otherwise — and collateral damage.

With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's first point, I am not in a position, at this stage, to say anything about the evidence that may or may not be given in connection with cases in Britain—that is sub judice. All I can say is that the police are pursuing their inquiries.

I recognise the important point that the right hon. Gentleman has made, but it would not be right for me to say anything further at this stage. I can appreciate that the plain identification of responsibility for an attack on airlines and airline safety would legitimately raise consideration of the question that the right hon. Gentleman has put.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Despite all this macho talk about vigorous action and an effective step forward, will my right hon. and learned Friend admit that all that the European Foreign Ministers have done is make a rather feeble attempt to half-shut the stable door after the F-111s have bolted?

As European policy now appears to be confined, in vigorous terms, to waving the Euroflag, will my right hon. and learned Friend admit that only a nation state and not the European Community can mount an effective and vigorous foreign and defence policy?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, I should have thought that the lesson to be drawn from these events is precisely the opposite. If each of the 12 nation states of Europe sought, independently, to take vigorous effective action, entirely of their own design, that would be far less effective than the 12 nation states taking effective collective action.

I have made plain the extent to which we would have preferred stronger action at an earlier stage. If we have effective implementation of these measures they will certainly have an impact on the threats against which they are directed.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Did any of the European Foreign Ministers tell the Secretary of State exactly why none of them supported Britain's involvement in the Libyan bombings?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That question was not raised, because it was quite clear that there was a widespread understanding of the ways in which different countries have reacted to what took place. Their concern was far more constructive and sensible—namely, what further action could and should be taken by the member states to diminish and eliminate the threat of terrorism.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will the Foreign Secretary continue to press the EEC not to spend a great deal of money on offering the same subsidies for food dumping to Libya as it does, for example, to India and Pakistan? Did the Secretary of State thank the representative of the Spanish Government for the fact that, although we are not able to buy Australian or South African sherry because of Spanish opposition, they have given us permission to continue to sell British sherry in Britain for another 10 years?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not recollect any recent discussions with my Spanish colleague or anybody else about the outstanding qualities of British sherry. The disposal of Community food surpluses takes place on world markets with the benefit of export subsidies. We are concerned to secure reform of the common agricultural policy because so much of the money is directed to either storage or disposal of food surpluses.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Did his European colleagues try to establish from the Foreign Secretary whether his version or the Prime Minister's version is the correct one as to when he first knew of the decision to attack Libya from British bases?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is and has been no mystery. My European colleagues have expressed no curiosity. The Prime Minister told the House in her first statement last week that we heard of a tentative decision, in principle, from the President before the weekend. There were discussion between the President's representatives, the Prime Minister, and the heads or Foreign Ministers of a number of European countries during the weekend, of which I was fully informed on my return from Germany.

On the Monday, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday, no Foreign Minister present at the meeting of the European Foreign Ministers had any knowledge that a final decision had been taken or of its nature and timing.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm the report in yesterday's Irish Times that Mr. Barry and the Irish Government intend to ensure that cheap EEC food should continue to go to Libya? Will my right hon. and learned Friend explain today how it is possible that the EEC can have some form of foreign policy when it is based on so many different and divergent traditions and interests?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The answer to that is to be found in my statement. The 12 European Community states have agreed on substantial common action. One cannot expect, even if one wanted it, an entire foreign policy to spring into existence overnight. It is a far more effective to have 12 member states acting together——

Mr. Budgen: But they do not.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: —instead of acting separately. I am afraid that I do not study The Irish Times with the same assiduity as my hon. Friend, but I heard nothing from the Irish Foreign Minister on Monday to suggest that Ireland is other than as deeply concerned as we are at the link between state-sponsored terrorism and the IRA. There was no suggestion whatever of their wanting to give any comfort to Libyan state-directed terrorism.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall do my best to call those hon. Members who have been rising, but I ask for brief questions.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Did the other EEC Foreign Ministers know of the widespread opposition in Britain to the bombing raids and the use of bases here? Why should the innocent be slaughtered because of the crimes of the guilty? Is the Foreign Secretary aware that he would have served his country far better if he had stood up to the Prime Minister last week and made it clear that it was folly to carry out the bombing raids and for bases here to be used for such purposes?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is characteristically, ranging over a wide area that the House has already covered. The Prime Minister, I and the other colleagues concerned were all committed to our decision. There was no question of anybody standing up to anyone else. Nor was there any question of my colleagues in the Community pressing me with criticism of what had been said and done. Of course they knew that opinions such as those expressed by the hon. Gentleman had been expressed in the House. They also knew that the Government had a substantial majority in the following debate. Nobody who has been connected with this matter can be unaware of the death and injury to innocent people. We have all made plain that we deeply regret that factor. It is not possible, however, in today's world to take effective action in defence of the innocent citizens of this and other communities who are killed by terrorist action and to guarantee that they will not be killed or injured, by such action.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Could we look a little more closely at the use of my right hon. and learned Friend's phrase "state terrorism"? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the phrase is most appropriately applied to countries that have invaded and occupied neighbouring countries in defiance of United Nations resolutions, such as the Soviet Union of Afghanistan, Vietnam of Kampuchea and Israel of Jordan, the Lebanon, Syria and Egypt? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that American foreign policy——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is getting wide of the EEC meeting.

Mr. Adley: I was going to ask whether my right hon. and learned Friend agrees that the Venice declaration produced by the European Community was the most constructive proposal that has yet emerged to solve the Palestinian problem, which lies at the root of middle eastern terrorism? What is being done to regenerate it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with the central point on which my hon. Friend closed his wide-ranging question and I agree with him about the importance of trying to inject new life into that approach.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Is not the best way in which to eradicate terrorism to remove its cause? Does that not mean tackling the problem of the Palestinians and Jerusalem? What measures does the right hon. and learned Gentleman propose to take with his American colleagues——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are again running wide of the statement.

Mr. Deakins: I should just like to ask what further steps with the United States are being proposed to resolve these problems in the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am anxious not to get drawn into a wide-ranging discussion of this question. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of the central question. However, it must be acknowledged that one of the problems we face, which was made clear in the discussions last week with His Majesty King Hussein, is that of securing sufficiently effective representative Arab unity to enable the dialogue to be advanced as we all wish. However, I shall not be drawn further than that.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, despite the measures that were agreed upon earlier this week, many hon. Members and many people outside Parliament consider that the response of our European partners has been woefully inadequate? I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's determination to continue to try to put some backbone into our European partners, but can he assure the House that the failure to reach agreement in Europe will not be a constraint upon further effective measures by this country, and that such measures could and should include the severing of all transport links with Libya and the exclusion of all Libyan nationals from our territory save those who qualify for political asylum?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The points raised by my hon. Friend go rather further than anything that has yet been suggested. We must bear in mind that our argument is not with the entire Libyan people but with the regime that is responsible for the direction of Libyan state-supported terrorism. In that context, we are prepared to take whatever action is necessary to ensure the security of this country, as evidenced by the action that was announced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. As for the Community, our actions and our own willingness to take far-reaching action two years ago, and again in the last fortnight, shows that of course we are prepared to take such action nationally as we think right, but equally I shall use the arguments of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members in supporting the case for more effective and widespread action in the Community.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): The House has yet to see the evidence that justified the murder of innocent Libyan people. Today I was informed by Salaheddin Msallm, the official who represents the Libyan Government, that he had been banned by the British Government from making any public comment about all these issues. Could it be that this Government, who allegedly proclaim their belief in free speech, are frightened of the truth coming out about this sad, sordid affair? There have been no reprisals against the British community in Libya. They have been well protected and well cared for. They are part of a counry that recognises their worth. Whether this Government recognise their worth is another matter, bearing in mind the danger from bombing that threatens not only the lives of Libyans but also the lives of British citizens.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is difficult to approach such a long question that has been posed from such a different perspective from that of most of the rest of the House. However, the hon. Gentleman must understand that the House is concerned about whether or not effective action can be taken against a deliberate and sustained series of attacks on innocent people by terrorist means. In that context, I do not believe that our record on freedom of speech can sensibly be compared with that of the Libyan regime, which today has proposed the expulsion of 250 Community and European journalists, either in retaliation or for some other reason. The hon. Gentleman ought to be pointing his gun in the opposite direction.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Did my right hon. and learned Friend have the chance to stress to our European friends, particularly the weak-kneed French, that the Western Alliance and NATO would not last a week without the backing of the United States and the force that it can bring to bear? If we are to be isolated, is it not best to be isolated with our friends rather than with our enemies? If the allies continue to deny to America the right to defend its people throughout the world, we shall end up with America becoming isolationist again. That would damage the interests of the free world, possibly for years to come.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely understand the importance of my hon. Friend's point. I have tried to point out, both within Europe and across the Atlantic, the importance of both pillars of the Alliance taking full account of each other's opinions and sensitivities. It is of the utmost importance that we should not allow Colonel Gaddafi to achieve within the Alliance what Moscow has been unable to achieve.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Albeit there was no knowledge of a final decision, will the Foreign Secretary spell out what he meant in answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he referred to "separate considerations and separate circumstances"? If we are a Community, there is surely a certain candour between Foreign Ministers. The French, having been asked for the use of air space, must have known what the proposition was. Why was there no discussion among the partners—albeit the circumstances were not, apparently, appropriate, according to the Foreign Secretary—on this vital, urgent issue? Why was it that the Secretary of State for Defence was left in ignorance until Monday 14 April? Will the Foreign Secretary answer the question that was eloquently put by Field Marshal Lord Carver in another place: who was consulted, and who agreed?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been trying to answer questions eloquently put in this place rather than those put in another place. The story has been plainly outlined. I have explained that the Prime Minister, myself, the Secretary of State for Defence and other colleagues were consulted in the first week. The Overseas and Defence Committee was convened on the——

Mr. Dalyell: Did the Foreign Secretary say that the Secretary of State for Defence was consulted?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That has been public knowledge for a long time. The knowledge of the Secretary of State for Defence, the Prime Minister and myself on the Monday was precisely the same until we heard——

Mr. Dalyell: But on Scottish radio he was for stopping attacks.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our knowledge was the same, on the basis of the consultations that took place during the weekend. The knowledge of a number of other European countries was on the basis of similar consultations, but not all of them. But none of us received news of any final decision that had been taken about what and when, until late on the Monday.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it comes ill from the Opposition to be critical of United States weapons, equipment and other factors that were used in the raid on Libya, because when they were in office their idea of deterrence in the middle east——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is asking a question that goes wide of the statement.

Mr. Walker: It refers to questions that were asked by the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should be asking a question of the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Walker: The European action was helped, but when the Opposition were in office it was not helped. Their idea of deterrence in the middle east was to order the Royal Force into action in battle zones unarmed. Their idea of——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman could get his question in if he were a little more sophisticated about it.

Mr. Walker: The Opposition's idea of effective deterrence was the ineffective Beira patrol.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that I sufficiently follow the inwardness of that question to be able to answer it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the British people will have noticed in the measures that he has announced today that there is no reference to the possibility of banks and other commercial institutions being affected in any way whatsoever? Is that not best exemplified by the fact that this Government refuse to take part in any exercises that result in a loss of profit for their friends in the City, although the Prime Minister is prepared, on a nod and a wink, to say to President Reagan, "Go ahead, you can cause loss of life?"

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, the hon. Gentleman has it absolutely wrong.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend able to evaluate the number of Libyan nationals to be expelled throughout the EEC? Does he share the concern of many people in this country that not a lot, and not enough, have been expelled so far? Will he confirm that security at Rome and Athens airports was looked at, bearing in mind that terrorist activity has taken place at both of them?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The specific incidents at Rome and Athens airports take us back some way in time. However, I know that at that time, and subsequently, much closer consideration was given to security at those airports. The intensification of airport security is one of the matters upon which agreement was reached last Monday. It was agreed that airport security should be the subject of urgent study by the Community's transport ministers. The best point to make about expulsions is that, as a result of the intensely strict visa regime that has been applied by this Government in the last two years to Libyans, the number of Libyans being admitted to this country including students has been reduced to about 10 per cent. of what it was previously.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Did any EEC country with American bases say that it was willing to allow them to be used in the event of a further American attack upon Libya? Was there not a very curious contradiction in the latter part of the Foreign Secretary's statement? He announced that we are on the brink of a trade war between the EEC and the United States of America, but there was no announcement of a trade war between the EEC and Libya. On the contrary, we are continuing to supply cheap foodstuffs to Libya, to which the Americans, quite rightly, object.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The first question did not arise. The second question is a completely false parallel. In the course of the action and counter-action being taken in relation to trade by the Community countries and the United States, both sides contemplate the imposition of retaliatory sanctions if, but only if, negotiations under article XXIV.6 are not successful.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): What institutional initiatives are Her Majesty's Government taking so that in future cheap European food is not used to strengthen those regimes that we would wish to weaken? Will my right hon. Friend take it from the Conservative Benches that there is nothing quite as supine as the IMF doormat on the Opposition Front Bench?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am always glad to endorse, even from my hon. Friend a valid judgment of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). The broader question must in essence be looked at in the context of the case for and against economic sanctions and in the context of the sustained action that is necessary to reduce the volume of subsidised exports for disposal.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): In the discussions between representatives of the American Government and the Prime Minister about targets to be bombed in Libya, did the Americans at any stage say that one of their objectives was the killing of Colonel Gaddafi?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my right hon. Friend told the House, we set strict criteria for the use of those aircraft based in the United Kingdom. They were to be directed against and every effort would be made to minimise collateral damage. The operation arrangements were within those criteria.

"clearly defined targets related to terrorism" — [Official Report, 15 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 729.]

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Did my right hon. and learned Friend remind his opposite numbers of the growing disenchantment in the United States at the European attitude, and in particular of the importance of the NATO Alliance? did he draw to their attention the damage that would have been done to the Alliance had not the United Kingdom supported the American action last week? In those circumstances, did he call upon his opposite numbers to take more effective and constructive action to deal with state-sponsored terrorism?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is precisely the point that I have already made in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont Dark). I have made plain to the United States and our European partners our concern for effective united action within the Alliance. If either side is heedless of the interests or concerns of the other side, that poses a risk to the Alliance.

Mr. Healey: Can the Foreign Secretary confirm the statement of the Secretary of State for Defence on the "Today" programme this morning that Her Majesty's Government have the right to refuse permission for the use of the RAF bases on which American aircraft are based in Britain for the delivery of nuclear weapons against the Soviet Union, but has only the right of consultation on the use of those bases against countries with which NATO is not in dispute? That is exactly the opposite of what a former Conservative Prime Minister told the House in the debate last week. Secondly, will he inform the Secretary of State for Defence that those bases are RAF bases, not American bases?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Plainly, they are RAF bases. Equally plainly, the whole basis of agreement rests on the Churchill-Truman understanding——

Mr. Healey: Answer the question.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am coming to that, if the right hon. Gentleman could contain his supine self for a second.

That 1952 agreement reaffirmed that the use of those bases in an emergency would be a matter for a joint decision by Her Majesty's Government, and under that arrangement either party can withhold agreement until it is satisfied on any point.

Mr. Healey rose——

Mr. Speaker: No, I think——

Mr. Healey: May I intervene for a moment as Pithecanthropus Erectus?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has had two bites.

References to Members

4.13 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I seek your guidance and information on the courtesies of the House? The Opposition spokesman on transport, the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), made an erroneous and ineffective attack upon me in the House at the beginning of the debate on transport yesterday without informing me in advance that he would refer to remarks that I had made. I have today told him that I shall be referring to him in the House and I invited him to be in his place to hear me do so.

If an hon. Member intends to refer to another hon. Member, is it not customary to give notice of that so that that hon. Member has the right to reply, should he wish to exercise it? Therefore, was the hon. Gentleman not yesterday grossly discourteous to the House and to me?

Mr. Speaker: I have looked at this matter because the hon. Gentleman raised it with me beforehand. It was not a serious attack, but I confirm that if a right hon. or hon. Member is to be mentioned in a debate, it is our courtesy that he is informed in advance.

Company Political Donations (Government Contractors)

4.14 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit companies which contract with the Government, or any department or agency thereof or any local government authority, from making donations, gifts or contributions either directly or in conjunction with any other company, association, or body or otherwise indirectly to any political party or to any candidate for Parliament.

The Bill deals with the murky, obscure and rather difficult subject of party finances and political contributions. It is part of a consistent plea by Labour Members and something that we shall implement when we return to power. It is a plea, first, for light, more light and still more light. Let us know what is happening in this area and let us know who is giving what to whom and why. Secondly, it is a plea for more democracy in political donations so that people do not find that companies are giving money on their behalf without their consent, with no power for them to opt out and without any real consultation on their views.

Ideally, political parties—this is a widely-held view—should be financed by the state, but until that happy day comes the very least that we can do is establish these two basic principles to dissipate the air of sleaze and scandal and the possibility of undue and unreasonable influence and of wrong deals which is all too prevalent today.

My Bill is part of that process and it is much the simplest part of the process because it provides, simply and straightforwardly, that public contractors — those working on or bidding for contracts with central Government, local government or public bodies—shall not make political donations to any party and shall not be considered for contracts if they make political donations to any party. That is a simple principle and it is one that is firmly established by law already in that great bastion of free enterprise, the United States, where federal legislation provides accordingly. My Bill is intended to follow that federal legislation in the United States.

I shall not unveil any great scandals, which is perhaps why the Press Gallery has emptied already, but it is wrong that, for example, Sir Horace Cutler, as Conservative leader of the GLC, set up in 1977 and again in 1981 his own political fund—Sir Horace was trying to be a mini-Lloyd George for beginners—which raised £22,000 in 1977 and £20,000 in 1981, and which was apparently mainly financed by builders with contracts with the GLC. Indeed, Wates gave £3,000 to the first of those funds, which was not reported in its accounts through the normal procedures. Some of the firms giving money to that fund —McAlpine, for instance—asked that restrictions be placed on the GLC's direct labour department as a price for those contributions. That is wrong.

It is also wrong that firms such as Trust House Forte, which has cleaning interests and donates £37,500 to the Tory election fund, and Pritchard, which gave £10,000 in 1982, £5,000 in 1983 and £12,000 in 1984, should be giving money to encourage Government to privatise cleaning contracts, particularly for the DHSS, but also for local councils. Indeed, that has often been done with disastrous results.

The National Union of Public Employees privatisation fact sheet, which appears regularly, devotes nine pages of the latest issue to faults, failures, inadequacies and lawsuits arising from hospital and local government cleaning contracts undertaken by firms, many of them donors to the Conservative party, as a result of privatisation, which their donations were presumably meant to encourage.

That principle is completely wrong. It is also wrong that defence contractors should make donations, especially because the area for competition in defence contracts is very limited. Even so, Plessey has donated £55,000 and Racal has donated £75,000. Even poor Westland donated £2,000 to the Conservative party. That may be a small donation in view of the company's financial position. Indeed, in view of the way that the company was treated by the Government, I would have expected the Government to give money to Westland rather than the company giving money to the Government.

It is also wrong that the principle of donations should apply in the new area of privatisation as we do not know what rules will govern contracts in that area. It is significant that half of the financial advisers and lead underwriters to the Government's privatisation programme are donors to the Conservative party or to its backing group, the Economic League. Kleinwort, Benson donated £30,000 to those organisations. It will not escape the attention of hon. Members that Kleinwort, Benson did very well out of the flotation of British Telecom, and many of the advisers did well out of that and other flotations.

As long as there are donations of this nature, there will always be the imputation that influence is being used, that favours are being sought and given or that contracts are being influenced. It is significant that construction is the fourth largest donor to the Conservative party. We do not know whether there are scandals in that area. However, there have been major scandals overseas, especially in Canada, over Government contracts for construction firms. It is important that we know what is happening and that justice is not only done but seen to be done. The Bill, plus the publication of company donations, will ensure that that is done.

The bulk of the contributions that we are discussing today will go to the Conservative party. That party has seen the justice of legislating to ensure publication of donations and to ensure full consent for donations made to the Labour party by trade unions. The Conservatives must therefore see the justice of establishing the same principle in the case of the even larger donations made to the Conservative party. There cannot be one law for the poor and one for the rich in this instance.

I do not know why people contribute to the Conservative party. They certainly cannot do that to get the benefits of the Government's economic policies which have brought disaster for so many firms, record rates of bankruptcies and closures and such record under-running in capacity. They cannot be contributing to secure honours because the Government assure us that that is not the case. The Government are honourable and I am sure that they would not lie, especially when they can use a carefully lawyered and cunningly phrased half-truth instead.

The donations must be made in the hope of gain. Donations are being made in the hope of gaining tax cuts for the substantially wealthy, the gain of Government contracts for City firms, cleaning firms and others. It is therefore vital that we establish the principle that these donations should not be made by firms which are bidding for Government contracts as there is a possibility of corruption. We have a responsibility to act against that possibility, and my Bill provides the way to achieve that.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Mark Fisher, Mr. Michael Meadowcroft, Mr. Nick Raynsford, and Mr. David Winnick.

Company Political Donations (Government Contractors)

Mr. Austin Mitchell accordingly presented a Bill to prohibit companies which contract with the Government, or any department or agency thereof or any local government authority, from making donations, gifts or contributions either directly or in conjunction with any other company, association, or body or otherwise indirectly to any political party or to any candidate for Parliament: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday next and to be printed. [Bill 141.]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time, and that this House take note of the White Paper "Developments in the European Community July-December 1985" (Cmnd. 9761).

Mr. Speaker: Before we proceed with this important debate, I must announce to the House that I have not selected either of the amendments on the Order Paper. It will, of course, be in order to advance the arguments set out in those amendments in the course of the debate. I must also tell the House that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. If necessary, I will introduce the 10 minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 8.50 pm

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have thought it right to include within the scope of the debate the latest White Paper "Developments in the Community."

The six months in question was, of course, dominated by the conference, whose outcome is the subject of the Bill now before the House. However, during that six months we also received the first of the abatements due to us under the Fontainebleau agreement. The Commission published its proposals for reform of the common agricultural policy, which emphasise the need for policies that we have long advocated, including sustained action on prices to bring about a better balance between supply and demand. [Interruption.] In a situation of serious overproduction worldwide——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I sense that the House is slightly confused by the Foreign Secretary's opening comments. He is moving the Second Reading of the Bill and not asking the House to take note of the White Paper.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is correct. I was simply stressing that it will be essential in this context to persist with the reforms initiated over the past few years, and for similar action to be undertaken in a number of other countries outside the Community.

The Bill will give effect in United Kingdom law to the changes to the treaties establishing the European Communities, which were agreed by the Prime Minister and other European Community Heads of Government in Luxembourg last December. That agreement is contained in the Single European Act, which was signed on behalf of the United Kingdom by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), the Minister of State, on 17 February. That Act embodies not only those agreed changes but also the new, specific treaty provisions on political co-operation that were introduced at the initiative of the United Kingdom.

I would like first of all to describe the Bill and then the Single European Act and its implications for the United Kingdom. The Single European Act involves changes in Community law. The main purpose of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill is to give effect to those changes as part of Community law applicable in the United Kingdom. The principal vehicle for that is clause 1, under which the relevant part of the Single European Act becomes a Community treaty within the meaning of the European Communities Act 1972.

Clause 2 covers the agreement by Heads of Government to attach a new court of first instance to the European Court of Justice. There is no question of extending the powers of the court to new areas. The court of first instance will simply provide for the more efficient disposal of the court's growing workload. This is a much needed improvement. The Bill will ensure that decisions of the new court of first instance will be given effect in United Kingdom law.

Clause 3 provides for the change in title of the European Assembly, which will formally be known as the European Parliament once the Single European Act enters into force. In this country it has already for some time been the practice of successive Governments to use the term European Parliament in all but formal legal documents. It is the term that was used by all the major parties in their manifestos for the direct elections to the Parliament in 1984 and indeed in all their manifestos in the 1983 general election as well. So clause 3 brings the law into line with well-established practice.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I may be wrong, but am I not right to believe that a Parliament is a legislature that can make laws and that the Assembly at present cannot make laws and is therefore not a legislature? Would it not be more appropriate to call it an Assembly unless we wish to give it powers to make laws? If we do that, will we reduce the powers of this House?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that we can confine the definition of a Parliament to a specific function. The fact is that nearly all hon. Members and in the country have talked about the European Parliament for many years.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Not all of us.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Of course there are one or two dissenters but the reality is that all the major parties, as I have said, spoke about the European Parliament at the last elections. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) retains a long-standing affection for the alternative phrase and he is likely to continue to use that phrase. However, we are now bringing official practice and official designation into line with well-established practice and that should be the end of that question.

Clause 3 also includes provision for the approval of a Single European Act for the purposes of section 6(1) of the European Assembly Elections Act 1978. I shall explain the purpose of these provisions when I come to describe the changes in the role of the Parliament that were agreed at Luxembourg.

Clause 4 contains the short title and consequent repeals.

So much for the Bill. I shall now tell the House something about the impact of the Single European Act. First, I shall deal with EC treaties and, secondly, with co-operation in foreign policy among the Twelve.

The main changes to the EC treaty fall into three groups. The first group updates it to include specific reference to, and an agreed basis for, long-established areas of Community activity which have been conducted so far as a piecemeal basis: notably research and technological development and environment. The second group introduces a carefully considered co-operation procedure involving the Council, the Commission and the European Parliament. Most important of all is the introduction of a commitment and timetable for completion of the common or internal market as one of the principal goals of the treaty and a long-standing aim of successive British Governments.

The Community has, of course, made real progress towards the completion of a common market in goods and services. The first part of that—abolishing tariff barriers to trade — was relatively easy. The second part — breaking down non-tariff barriers — has proved more difficult. As the House knows well, these barriers take many forms. They include technical standards for industrial products, which mean that in practice only the domestic product can be sold in its own market. They include barriers to services, including rules such as those which currently apply in some member states prohibiting their citizens buying insurance from anywhere outside their domestic markets.

There are barriers to the exercise of the professions, some of which we have already succeeded in dismantling — for example, the agreements that we reached on architects and pharmacists last year. They include numerous impediments to a liberal transport policy. Among these are the provisions for quota restrictions on lorry movements between one Community country and another which inhibit free competition. Another example is the cartel arrangements which still apply to air travel.

The implications of the completion of the internal market for Britain can be put in three ways. First, we must think about the implications of not achieving a common market.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs did not mention that the agreement that was reached on architects took 17 years to complete. He did not mention either whether the Single Act will have any effect on health regulations, for example, which are used as a form of non-tariff barrier.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall deal with health regulations in a moment. The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that progress on non-tariff barrier restrictions on the single market has been lamentably slow. That is one of the reasons for the changes which are now being proposed for moving in the areas which I shall define, from unanimity to majority voting. I was merely pointing out that we have made some progress, and I have given two examples. Of course, we want to make more progress. As I have said, the implications of not having a common market would remain serious.

We are a nation that already sends 48 per cent. of its exports to members of the European Community and Britain needs to have completely free access to those markets. We need to ensure that that free access is mutual so that benefits enjoyed by trade and services coming to this country can be enjoyed by our exporters elsewhere. That applies especially to the services sector and to certain areas of transport such as maritime shipping. That is why the views of British industry are so plainly in support of the commitment to the early establishment of the common market. All the major organisations such as the CBI, the Institute of Directors, the British Institute of Management and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce have long campaigned for the completion of the internal market.

Thirdly, there are benefits for our citizens. By deregulating coach services in Britain six years ago, for example, we have achieved a 50 per cent. increase in passengers, a 20 per cent. increase in services and a decrease in fares in real terms of up to 40 per cent. The benefits are obvious to service operators and consumers and to manufacturers as well. This is because an expansion of economic activity is taking place. How much more obvious the benefits would be if that could be achieved on a European scale.

My second example is air transport. Thanks to our persistent efforts we have succeeded in reaching bilateral agreements with the Netherlands and Germany. We are currently negotiating an agreement with Denmark. The agreement and arrangements between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands have led already to a drop in the cheapest air fare from £82 to £49 and an increase of 16 per cent. in air traffic between the two countries—70,000 extra passengers and 10 new services in the first year. Once again, how much more effective it would be if we could make similar progress throughout the Community.

Thus far the remaining obstacles to the completion of the internal market have been largely political. That underlines the importance of the success that we have achieved in getting completion of the internal market at the top of the Community's agenda.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it not the case that air fares for travel from the United Kingdom to the United States have reduced substantially and rather more dramatically than air fares from the United Kingdom to Europe? Is it not possible to achieve what my right hon. and learned Friend is talking about without having a common market, without having the Treaty of Rome, without having a Single European Act and without having all the excessive bureaucracy that is involved in maintaining that structure?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is possible to achieve deregulation between two countries. I have explained that that has been achieved between ourselves and the Netherlands. The effect of a Community framework would be to apply a general policy of liberalisation, and that has been considered by the Community for some time. It is the habit and practice of working together on a Community basis that is more likely to promote the achievement of agreements than working under a series of bilateral arrangments. I see no argument against what we are trying to do. Indeed, the contrary is the case.

It is important that we have succeeded in putting completion of the internal market at the top of the Community's agenda but institutional problems have been tackled as well, such as the requirement—this takes up the issue raised by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) — that measures to complete the internal market can be taken only by unanimity under article 100 of the treaty. That is one of the institutional problems that we have been addressing.

When we came to discuss the possibility of a treaty change a general agreement developed that, where political determination could be reinforced and facilitated, that should be done by making carefully balanced changes in the Community treaty. In the Single European Act these changes take two main forms. First, there is a definition of the internal market and a commitment to its completion by 1992. Secondly, there is the provision that in most of the internal market areas that have so far been subject to unanimity majority voting should apply.

Once the changes have been ratified in all member states, with some exceptions that I shall describe, qualified majority will replace unanimity for the measures which are major components of the construction of the common market. These are policies for sea and air transport, for the right to provide services freely in another member state and for the agreement of common standards that are the key to export growth.

These are potentially important changes but at the same time their scope is not indefinite. It was recognised that some subjects were of such importance to the national policies of individual member states that they should remain subject to unanimity voting. The three principal topics for which unanimity is retained are tax measures, measures relating to the free movement of individuals and measures affecting the rights and interests of employed persons.

For Britain and Ireland, among others, perhaps, there was an additional need reflecting our position as island countries with special requirements in terms of human, animal and plant health. Our position is protected in that respect by an additional safeguard that will permit us to retain or take national measures on the ground of significant need, notably where health, safety, environment and consumer protection are involved. That is not intended to extend to the preservation of measures of the sort for which there can be no justification on that ground.

I know that there are some who will be anxious that in promoting the achievement of an internal market in this way we may diminish the essential protection of our national interest that is inherent in the requirement for unanimity. I would not accept that: first, because we have got the safeguards that I have described, which protect us on the key issues; secondly, because it will be open to us to combine with other member states to form a blocking minority; and, thirdly, because, as a last resort, the Luxembourg compromise remains in place untouched and unaffected. When I say the last resort, I mean it, because I strongly believe that it will benefit this country more for progress to be made towards completion of the internal market through the introduction of qualified majority voting than for progress to remain blocked, as it often has been in the past, by one member state alone.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): With regard to the Luxembourg compromise, could my right hon. and learned Friend explain to the House why it was that on the one occasion that I know of that this country tried to use its rights under that compromise we were not allowed to do so?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It was because, as the House well knows, the Luxembourg compromise is not a provision of the treaty; it is a component of political reality in the Community. We were outvoted on the occasion in 1982 because other member states argued that our invocation of that proposition was unrelated to the matter in hand; in other words, we were seeking to invoke it in a wider area unconnected with the point on which the discussion was taking place. That was the position in 1982. That argument would remain available in today's circumstances. The one thing that is clear is that the Luxembourg compromise as I have described it is in no way affected one way or the other by the Single European Act.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. and learned Friend will know that there is a short sentence in the Single European Act referring to these measures which says:

"The Commission, in its proposals . . . concerning health, safety, environmental protection and consumer protection, will take as a base a high level of protection."

Is this not likely to have two effects which we can do very little about? One is that if there is a socialistic majority on the other side of the Channel we shall have all sorts of socialism rammed down our throats. The second is that, if a lot of European industries gang up together to set conditions which are to their advantage and to the disadvantage of British industries, there will be nothing that we can do about it.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The provisions will still be governed by decisions taken under the qualified majority proposals described in the changes being made and will be subject in the same way to the Luxembourg compromise unchanged by anything in these provisions. I really do believe that it will benefit this country more for us to be making progress towards completion of the internal market through the use of qualified majority voting than for that progress to remain blocked, as it has often been in the past, as the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber pointed out, by one member state alone.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: On the desperately important point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne), is the Foreign Secretary saying that the only time that we tried to use the Luxembourg compromise in recent years, in 1982, it did not work and that the only safeguard we have, the Luxembourg compromise, can be used only if the majority of other member states agree with us that it is of supreme national interest for our country? Does not that mean that the Luxembourg compromise is no real protection at all?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Luxembourg compromise is not set out in the treaty and is not, therefore, provided for with the precision that would appeal to my hon. Friend, but the nature of it is unchanged by the proceedings which we are now considering.

The Luxembourg compromise, as many hon. Members have said, has cast its shadow over many considerations and has deferred the reaching of decisions in many circumstances; it has upheld our national interest and that of many other countries, so that people have recognised that it was the weapon that could be exercised in the last resort. That reality remains. I will give just one example. We had a very important package last year of 15 industrial standards directives which had been agreed in 1984 and had been held up by one member state and then another in isolation for over 12 months.

The other major changes in the treaty incorporated in the Single European Act are those which involve long-standing areas of co-operation which so far have not been formally reflected in the treaty itself. The first is co-operation in research and technological development. That activity has been taking place in the context of meetings of Research Ministers since 1975.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On the question of the European initiative on cancer research, would it be fair to say that this has been rather disappointing so far? What are the various countries of the Community going to do to fulfil the hopes of co-operation in cancer research that the right hon. and learned Gentleman put forward six months ago?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not able instantly to tell the hon. Gentleman the position on that, but it is being considered by ministerial colleagues. My hon. Friend will no doubt have an opportunity of dealing with it in her reply.

The other area of change, apart from that of research and development, is in the treaty amendments governing the environment. Again, the Community has had environmental action programmes since July 1973 and there are already a number of directives in the environment field. That activity is now being codified.

I come next to the role of the European Parliament, because this is a topic to which a great deal of attention has been given.

A lot of attention was given to the role of the Parliament in the debate on 5 March and in particular to the so-called co-operation procedure, which was very fully and expertly described in the report prepared for that debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation. As hon. Members will know, the European Parliament already has the right to be consulted under some 17 articles of the treaty. The Single European Act provides that for 10 articles, including some new ones, that procedure will be changed.

The new co-operation procedure is designed to enable the Parliament to make its views known, and for the Council to take account of them, before positions have become set in concrete. Under the 10 articles to which I referred—mainly measures affecting the internal market—when a proposal goes to the Council, the Council will have a discussion on it and adopt a common position. Thereafter, if the Parliament, by an absolute majority of all its members, votes for amendments to that proposal, both Council and Commission will have to take account of those amendments.

Where the Commission agrees to change its proposal to accommodate the Parliament's amendments, the Council, as now, can further change the Commission proposal only by unanimity. Where the Council accepts the revised proposal, it will, as now, vote according to the relevant article of the treaty. If the Parliament rejects altogether the common position of the Council, the Council can still vote through a proposal in the form in which it wants it to be enacted, but in those circumstances it must do so by unanimity.

In short, therefore, the Parliament can in certain circumstances change the Council's voting provisions back from qualified majority to unanimity. In no circumstances can it change them the other way.

The new co-operation procedure will produce a greater awareness in Council and Parliament of each other's views, but it will make no decisive change in the institutional balance because the last word remains with the Council. If judiciously used, the new procedure could enable the Parliament to play a more active and positive role in Community decision-taking. The Parliament is one of the Community's institutions. It was elected in 1984 by 114 million people and serves a total population of 320 million. Its negative powers are considerable — the House has always acknowledged that—but its positive opportunities have until now been relatively few. If it works co-operatively with the Council and the Commission, that can only be in the interests of faster decision-taking, for the benefit of the Community as a whole.

The Single European Act involves two further changes.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that these proposals enhance the role of the Parliament? If so, is that not to the disadvantage of other institutions in the Community?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Let there be no misunderstanding about this. The Council can reject European Parliament amendments by a qualified majority where the Commission does not adopt them as its own. Where the Commission does adopt them as its own, the Council can reject them by unanimity. That represents no change from the present position, but of course the pattern of exchanges that I have described will enhance the potential influence of the Parliament and that will, I believe, be in the interests of faster decision-taking, to the benefit of the Community as a whole.

I should like to deal with two further changes in the role of the European Parliament. At present, the Parliament's opinion is required on requests by non-member states to join the Community. Henceforth, the Parliament will have to give its agreement before such accessions can take place. This change does not diminish the role of national Parliaments. No new accession can take place without the consent of this Parliament and of every other national Parliament. Similarly, the European Parliament will henceforth be entitled to approve new association agreements between the Community and non-member states. These agreements take various forms. Where the consent of national Parliaments is currently required, that will remain the case for the future.

It is these two new provisions which give rise to the requirement under section 6 of the European Assembly Elections Act 1978 for the Single European Act 1986 as a whole to be approved by the House. That requirement is covered in clause 3 of the Bill.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the most important features of the Act is the extension of majority voting? In cases where the Council takes a majority vote, the only way in which the views of elected people can be directly brought to bear is through the European Parliament.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is not the only way. I take the point made by my hon. Friend. That is an additional channel through which those views can be brought to bear, but they can also be brought to bear by the impact on members of the Council by national Parliaments.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend not find it extraordinary that those hon. Members who were claiming that the unanimity rule had been breached are now complaining because the Parliament, apparently, has powers to enforce the unanimity rule?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have explained the position. These changes will enable the Parliament to secure a change from majority voting to unanimity. As my hon. Friend points out, on the whole that should be a change in the direction in which my other hon. Friend said would be welcome.

I should now like to turn to the other part of the Single European Act 1986 which is not part of the Bill but which is in the document, the treaty provisions dealing with foreign policy. They do not form part of the Bill, because they do not and will not form part of Community law. However, the House will wish to take this opportunity to consider these provisions which relate to foreign policy.

The new treaty provisions do not in themselves break new ground, but for the first time they enshrine in an international agreement the agreements and practices that have been built up over the last 15 years. The treaty also strengthens the existing commitment to consult on the economic and political aspects of security questions. As hon. Members said, in the last couple of weeks that objective has faced a severe practical test. Events have dramatically demonstrated the need for Europe to speak with one voice. To the extent that I have described, Europe has demonstrated a growing capacity to do so. [Interruption. The House may be dismissive about this, but it represents a substantial change. It would not have been possible to mobilise agreement between 12 independent nations to the extent that we have done so were it not for the habit of working together in the European Community.

On Monday, we took a significant step towards denying Libya the capacity to mount terrorist actions in Europe. Of course, that outcome was not reached quickly or easily. As people pointed out, we could have gone further on our own. But vigorous action by one member state could not be as effective as concerted action by 12 member states. If the terrorist threat in Europe is to be reduced, the tentacles put out by Gaddafi or by anybody else have got to be severed in Greece as well as in Great Britain, in Lisbon as well as in London. That is the significance of the step we took this week and that step was an important achievement. We need to build on this beginning. It must inevitably be harder to agree common action than simple consultation. That task will be helped by the treaty provisions that we have agreed.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The Secretary of State has told the House that the provisions for political co-operation are not embodied in our law by the Bill. That is what I understood him to say. Could he explain how the embodiment of title I does not do that, because article 3.2 of title I appears specifically to bring into force the contents of title III?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It brings into force title III because that title is a component of the international agreement which is here set out. It brings it into force as an agreement binding in international law between the member states, but it does not require incorporation in the law of member states. Of course, it requires to be brought into force as an agreement between member states. That is why I am describing it now, because it is translating into a binding international agreement the habits and practices that have grown up on political co-operation in recent years.

An important aim of these treaty provisions—and they are treaty provisions — is to achieve greater consistency between external policies that are decided within the Community framework on matters such as trade and aid, and the foreign policy objectives identified by member states on political co-operation. Clearly, we need to make sure that policies decided in the Community march alongside and reinforce actions and assessments agreed in political co-operation.

The treaty will also provide for the creation of a small secretariat based in Brussels that will help the presidency of the day. That will provide greater continuity between presidencies, help to ensure consistency in Community policies, and take on the burden of arranging meetings, most of which will take place in Brussels. This task now falls on the presidency of the day. The secretariat officials will be seconded on a rotating basis from their national Administrations.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Would my right hon. and learned Friend care to comment on the fact that on Second Reading of a Bill of this importance that deals with the future of Britain and the European Community, the most important measure in this field since 1972, there are six Labour Members present, one Scottish Nationalist, one Unionist, one Liberal and not a single member of the Social Democratic party?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is an interesting observation because it shows that the matter is no longer something about which there is great controversy. I am not in the least surprised that there remains a small, valiant and observant watch on the Government side of the House. That is also the case when we are debating other topics. The generality of the propositions I am commending are well supported on both sides of the House. I know that the small and enthusiastic group of my hon. Friends who are in the House are anxious about references to European union in the preamble to the Single European Act 1986. Such declarations are not new in the Community. They have been made at European Councils under successive Governments, Labour as well as Conservative, since at least 1972.

The reference in the Single European Act specifically relates to the Stuttgart Declaration agreed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the other Heads of Government in June 1983. That declaration referred to the growing unity among the member states in the following terms:

> "European Union is being achieved by deepening and broadening the scope of European activities so that they coherently cover, albeit on a variety of legal bases, a growing proportion of member states mutual relations and of their external relations".

We are not talking about the declaration or proclamation of a United States of Europe or about vague political or legal goals. We are talking about practical steps towards the unity that is essential if Europe is to maintain and enhance its economic and political position in a harshly competitive world.

These are steps to which all the member Governments are ready to agree. No doubt the House will hear a good deal from some of my hon. Friends and from some Opposition Members about the fearful constitutional fantasies that preoccupy them. Those are terrors for children; not for me. I hope that the House will put them aside.

In a world where no European power can any longer stand on its own, our national goals can be achieved only in co-operation with our Community partners. The most fundamental of those goals has always been the preservation of peace and the enhancement of democracy. The Single European Act serves that fundamental objective. It enhances co-operation in foreign policy, and it enhances our ability to take the steps that we need to take as a Community to make ourselves competitive internationally and to create prosperity and jobs. It is on that basis that I commend the Bill to the House.

4.59 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): In many ways the importance of this debate can be measured by the fact that a Scot is making the opening Opposition speech and that another Scot will make the closing one in an evening when, at Wembley, an even older union than that with Europe will be put under even greater strain than the European Community is under now because of the unhappiness of some Conservative Members.

About nine weeks from now the Foreign Secretary will take over the presidency of the European Council of Ministers. He will then find himself in the driving seat of a European Community with massive and seemingly insuperable problems. He will find another gigantic crisis, with the cash already running out and all the promises of budget discipline that were paraded before us last year lying in a heap. The CAP is again out of control, its costs swallowing up bigger and bigger chunks of the entire Community budget, and with no sign of reform on the horizon.

A new and frightening split has developed between the traditional allies in western Europe and the United States of America, with the Community incapable of persuading President Reagan of the consequences and dangers of his recklessness. A trade war with the United States is not far away either. The 12 nations in the Community for which the Foreign Secretary will take responsibility on 1 July have over 15 million people out of work. Two in every five are under the age of 25. Little or nothing is being done to mobilise the political will to get them back to work. On top of all that, the competitive edge of our collective industrial capacity is continually under challenge from the far east, from Japan and from the Americans.

That is the European Community which the Foreign Secretary will inherit in only nine weeks' time. It is a formidable prospect, and it is easy to see why the Minister, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), the Mary Poppins of the Tory party, has been drafted in to put an acceptable face on the solutions which the Foreign Secretary might have to dredge out during his presidency.

In the face of all those mind-blowing problems, we are today considering a wholly irrelevant Bill that will give effect to what is remarkably and, indeed, mysteriously called the Single European Act. The 11 other national Parliaments will later do the same thing. However, so remarkable and mysterious is the Act's name that during the last debate the Minister of State, who is responsible for European Community affairs, did not know why it was called the Single European Act. Moreover, at the Königswinter conference a couple of weeks ago at Cambridge, her opposite number in the German Government confessed that he did not have a clue why it was called that.

Today, the Foreign Secretary seemed to say that the Single European Act was the greatest thing since imperial preference, but it is, in reality, a child whom he and the Prime Minister wanted to strangle at birth. When the Prime Minister came back last July from her humiliation at the Milan summit, she was absolutely explicit to the House when she said:

[Mr. George Robertson]

"positive improvements in the Community's decision-making could have been decided in Milan and did not require any treaty amendment . . . I saw nothing before us that would require an amendment to the treaty."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 185-89.]

Even before Milan, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who has now been parachuted into the Cabinet, but who served on the Dooge committee, whose ideas formed the basis of the Single European Act, rubbished, with characteristic vigour and in his own inimitable style, the idea of amending the treaty. He said:

"Her Majesty's Government believe that major progress can be made at the present time without amending the treaty".

The right hon. and learned Member for Pentlands also made another point that should not escape us. He said:

"Once one embarks on the road of treaty amendment, one must bear in mind that, in whatever area it is amended, it will require not only the unanimous agreement of all 12 member Governments but the unanimous ratification of all 12 national Parliaments. Even if any proposals were considered to be acceptable, at the least we would be contemplating a delay of one, two or possibly even three years before such a process would be complete."—[Official Report, 20 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 473.]

Those are the words, not of some fly-by-night forecaster, or of some marginal figure who, like so many Conservative Members, has held high office and then gone into well-deserved obscurity, but of a man who has been promoted as a result of his record as a Minister with responsibility for the Common Market. He is now a full member of the Cabinet. We should therefore accept the authority of his words, his prophecy and his pessimism. We look forward to hearing from his successor later in the debate and to finding out whether the hon. Lady can say when this new vision that has been paraded before us will become a reality.

We have a measure which the Government did not want, thought unnecessary and believed would divert us for years away from the real areas that need attention, yet it is now placed before us as the answer to all our problems. The Government and the then Minister of State were right then, just as the Foreign Secretary is wrong today. This measure is of profound irrelevance to the deep-seated concerns of Europe's peoples, and it diverts us from the remedies and solutions for which we should be reaching.

The Labour party believes that Europe's nations should be looking together for a strategy for growth and the creation of jobs. We believe that with political will and courage such a strategy is both possible and necessary, and could be successful. Indeed, the annual economic report of the European Commission, which was published in November 1985, and which is dismissed in a couple of lines in the White Paper tacked on to this debate, is entitled, "A Co-operative Growth Strategy for More Employment", but we have heard not a word about the report from the Government. Of course, that is not surprising when this country has the highest unemployment rate known in modern times.

We believe that radical reform of the CAP is urgently needed and should be a precondition of any possible future action by the Community in any area because its financial excesses endanger all programmes, but we have heard nothing on that subject today, although it is necessarily part of the debate. We believe in the importance of the regional and social funds, and in their being properly funded to redistribute the Community's resources in a better and more organised way. The Single European Act places obligations on the regional and social funds in order to avoid the worst problems that might arise in a wider and more effective internal market, but the Government have voted to cut those valuable instruments of economic action and to sit immobile as the CAP's excesses threaten a drying-up of the funds, with all that that means for our own regions.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues should be congratulated on their efforts to bring the Labour party into modern Europe. In his consultations with representatives of the Social Democratic and Socialist parties observers in the Community, does he find the same lack of enthusiasm for institutional developments as he has just expressed?

Mr. Robertson: I know that the hon. Gentleman finds himself on the margins of this debate, and he will probably remain there for most of it. In discussions with Social Democratic and Socialist colleagues it became clear that their priority is that of the Labour party, which is to use the engine of European economic growth to get our people back to work. Institutional reform is still well down the ladder of their priorities, just as it is for ours.

We believe in joint collaboration on research and technology, and in using public funds in Europe to stimulate the Eureka project—and ESPRIT—to counter the competition from the ill-directed public largesse of the American SDI programme and the economic locomotive in the far east.

We believe that in all these ways Europe could mean something to its beleaguered citizens, but the Single European Act and the Bill offer them little or nothing. Institutional reform is the bread and circuses of European politics. It erects monuments—usually in paper—when people instead want action and results.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): This is a most interesting deployment of the hon. Gentleman's case. I wonder whether he can square his statement of Labour party policy with the comment of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman on trade, who was not only part of the research group of the Labour Common Market Safeguards Committee, but edited a report in September 1985, which seems to be at variance with what the hon. Gentleman has been saying for the last five minutes?

Mr. Robertson: No, it is not. My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is entitled to his opinions. He holds a Front-Bench position and will undoubtedly express his own point of view, but I assure the hon. Lady that his views and mine on most of the practical issues of European policy do not diverge as much as she would like them to do.

I wish to concentrate on a couple of areas of the Single European Act which I believe show how meaningless even this Government see this treaty change. The first is an area in which we broadly agree with the Government as being desirable. In Common Market gobbledegook they call it

European political co-operation, but they mean foreign policy co-operation. The Act calls on the European Community to

"endeavour jointly to formulate and implement a European foreign policy" and to

"undertake to inform and consult each other on any foreign policy matters of general interest" and

"avoid any action or position which impairs their effectiveness as a cohesive force in international relations or within organisations."

It is small wonder that we have heard so little of this matter from the Foreign Secretary this afternoon. This pie in the sky is a considerable embarrassment to the Government in a week when they have found themselves seriously out of line with their Community partners. Perhaps I might remind the hon. Lady of her words in the debate on 5 March, although they ring somewhat hollow in the light of today's and this week's events. She said:

"It is helpful to be in firm political combination with our partners in Europe, as we have shown in the past two months in the statement on terrorism".—[Official Report, 5 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 403.]

A week after the bombing of Libya from bases in Britain, which were used in the face of united and concerted Europen opinion, and two weeks after consultation and discussion in the Community on Libya, we get some limp decision to stop the export of subsidised butter to that evil regime, but no statement on other subsidised products which flow from these shores to that regime, which we are told is to be isolated in every way possible. Are the Government still muddling around trying to be Communautaire on the one hand, and halfheartedly endorsing this idea of "informing and consulting" our partners, while at the same time trying to square it with our obsequious toadying to the Americans and their anti-Europeanism?

We have been told that the Foreign Secretary is the architect of the draft treaty on foreign policy co-operation —or so all the British papers told us before the Milan summit fiasco — but as the architect surveys the shambles for which he has personally been responsible, should he not reflect on the other areas where the rhetoric that he peddles with such conviction in his speeches founders so often on the reality of his actions?

It is not just on Libya that Her Majesty's Government depart from the European line. They vetoed the common line on South Africa and the minimal sanctions proposed until President Reagan had done his U-turn. They ignored the united voice expressed among our partners about the Falkland Islands, where we stand alone. They ignored the unanimous advice offered on our supine withdrawal from UNESCO, and they show none of the genuine feeling of concern for American action in central America that is shared by our European partners.

What do the Government mean by "formulating and implementing a European foreign policy?" Is it to be the Prime Minister's policy just foisted on our European partners, or will she and other Ministers start to listen to the other members of the Community when they speak —and speak sense too?

Mr. Marlow: Would the hon. Gentleman like to take this opportunity to tell the House and the country whether the Labour party is now totally and utterly anti-American?

Mr. Robertson: It is always likely that the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who usually spends his time harassing Ministers, will try to attack the Opposition, but if that is the level of his criticism I think that he had better stay in his seat for the rest of the evening. The Labour party is not anti-American, it never has been, and it is unlikely to be in the future.

The central issue of this Act, we are now told, is not better decision making within the Community, as the Dooge committee told us, but the vision of the internal market. The dream of Lord Cockfield is to be the target of the British presidency and all the eggs are to be precariously placed in this basket. The Dooge committee was eloquent on the objectives of the internal market. It said that it "would mean more jobs, more prosperity and faster growth, and would thus make the Community a reality for its citizens."

Nowhere are we told when or how this is all to take place, or how, in a recession-battered continent, fewer barriers will not just mean shared misery and not increased prosperity.

To get to Lord Cockfield's dream, this Act introduces qualified majority voting, and single majority voting, across a host of areas in EEC decision making, stretching from Common Market banking and insurance to directives on radio and television broadcasting.

The Labour party is not opposed to moves towards a more genuine internal market. It is not opposed to reducing some of the bureaucratic and protectionist barriers to trade inside the European Community. However, there are fundamental issues at stake for this country, and all the heady vision of Lord Cockfield and the Foreign Secretary himself do not answer the points.

First, do the Government have any idea of the effects that these changes will have on British industry—for employment, for our balance of payments, for the degree of import penetration, for our balance of trade in manufacturing, which has now sunk so low, and for our invisible earnings from services? Nothing that they have said in the last two years suggests that they have the slightest clue about the effect, but if they have, they have a duty to tell us in detail in a White Paper which the House can consider. We have asked for that repeatedly. It is one of the minimal requests that this House can make, but the Government have failed to provide such information. Conversely, they may not know the effects—that is the most likely scenario—and we are embarking on another experiment, a gamble with what is left of Britain's future for the sake of the free market ideology of the Government.

The second point on the internal market concerns the desire by Lord Cockfield and by the European Commission and others to get to fiscal harmonisation, especially of VAT rates. The Government have rightly stressed their opposition to that feature. We welcome that commitment and the fact that such changes will be subject to unanimity, but Lord Cockfield, who is a key member of the Thatcher establishment, is fully wedded to fiscal harmonisation, and he is not alone.

Sir Henry Plumb, the leader of the Tory Members of the European Parliament, said in the debate on 11 December in the European Parliament:

"It was hard to see how there could be an internal market without a measure of harmonisation in fiscal matters."

What confidence can the House have that the Prime Minister's resolution will stand up to such powerful influences within the Community when she so enthusiastically accepts the basic philosophy of Lord Cockfield and the other free traders?

The third point of principle on the interal market concerns the British Government's view of the internal market and how it diverges from that of the other member states. The Government's ideology sees a free trade area — a Europe-wide enterprise zone — with deregulation triumphant and all social protections dismantled, but for our partners in the European Community, even those on the Right wing, it is about much more than that.

The President of the European Commission, Jacques Delors, said in January:

"The creation of a vast economic area based on the market and business co-operation is inconceivable, I would say, unattainable, without some harmonisation of social legislation."

Yet the Single European Act which we are asked to approve today treats the people of Europe as inferior to the goods which they produce.

Because unanimity is to be required for provisions relating to the "rights and interests of employed persons", our Government will go on denying the people of Britain —and indeed the rest of the European Community—the benefits of directives on employee consultation and information, parental leave and worker participation. Instead, Lord Young has presented a programme for deregulation Community-wide which will strip workers of many of the rights which they already enjoy.

The Government say that this is because they believe, first, that the directive would impose costs on small and medium-sized businesses and would destroy jobs; and, secondly, that such arrangements are a matter between employers and employees. Neither of those foot-dragging excuses stands up. To take one example, the House of Lords Select Committee could find no reason for believing that the directive on parental leave, which the Government still insist on vetoing, would impose burdens on industry which would result in job losses, since it would affect only 1 per cent. of the people.

The Government find it convenient to accept European legislation on health and safety and, with some reluctance, legislation on equal pay, but they happily meddle in their own industrial law jungle. Why, therefore, should they veto the beneficial standards set by the Community if they truly believe in a genuine internal market?

Where we really distrust the Government in their belief in the idea of an internal market which will work for the interests of Europe's people is on the impact on the regions. The Single European Act recognises explicitly, even if the Government will not admit it, that if the internal European market is to succeed, it can only be through the achievement of economies of scale in production. If that is not to mean another magnet for industry, drawing it to the golden triangle in the centre of northern Europe, the Community needs the clout of the regional and social funds.

The Act calls on the Community to

"in particular aim at reducing disparities between the various regions and the backwardness of the least favoured regions" and says that

"the implementation of the common policies and of the internal market shall take into account the objectives."

The Act demands that there be new rules for the management of the structural funds and that they should be subject to unanimity. The Government must tell the House whether they will allow the regional and social funds to do what they are designed to do and what the Single European Act says they must do. Will the cash crisis which threatens these valuable—and now legally designated valuable—funds be solved in their favour, or in favour of a capitulation to the German farm lobby?

If the words in the Single European Act mean what they say, and if the Government mean what they subscribe to, we might have some faith in these changes in the Treaty of Rome. However, we agreed with Ministers and with the Prime Minister before the Milan summit when they said that treaty amendments were unnecessary, undesirable and a time-wasting diversion. The Labour party has not done any somersaults and still believes that that is the case.

Even when it struggles through the 12 Parliaments, this measure will not help even one of Europe's unemployed, and it will not add 1 per cent. to Europe's pitiful and lamentable growth rate. Nor will it galvanise the political will which alone can transform European words into action which our peoples will understand. Instead, it will provide another bureaucratic alibi for inaction on the key areas of the Community's crisis—inaction on the food mountains and on the price regime which builds them, and inaction on real technology co-operation to ensure our future.

The Single European Act will mean more majority voting, nominal and purely cosmetic references to monetary union, a gesture to increased influence in the European Parliament, foreign policy co-operation, and more paper commitments to technological development. That is the summation of the Single European Act. To pretend that it is a substitute for political courage and economic hard progress is to delude cynically all the people of the Community. It is a diversion from the real task before us. That is why we shall vote against it tonight.

5.26 pm

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): This is a short Bill but its appearance entirely belies its significance. As the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said in his thoughtful speech, it is probably, in terms of Britain's membership of the European Community, the largest constitutional measure that the House has had to discuss since our discussions on the European Communities Act 1972. It is right that we in this House should be concerned about and interested in the constitutional proposals which are put in front of us. We have very good reasons in practical terms to be most proud of our own constitution and the experience which we have evolved over the centuries.

We have learnt in our democracy how to provide Governments with authority, yet at the same time to provide opportunities for those of us who are privileged to be in the House as the people's representatives to exercise some control over that authority—a process which, in the context of the increased growth of the power of the Executive, we have substantially enhanced by the introduction of departmental Select Committees in recent years. All of us who are privileged to be Members of Parliament have every reason to defend what we have improved over the centuries; indeed, have been ready to defend at any time that it came into peril.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): My right hon. Friend has welcomed the evolution of the British constitution. Does he agree that this Bill represents evolution within the European Community and should be welcomed equally?

Sir Edward du Cann: I think that the Bill represents a very substantial step forward in the process of constitutional change on which this country deliberately embarked some years ago. The question I have to ask is whether the pace is correct.

I listened with great interest to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said. He used a phrase that I found offensive. It is wholly wrong to describe those of us who have shown a genuine interest in constitutional matters over a long time. We have arrived at our view after most careful thought, and hold it sincerely. I do not care for being called, in his phrase, one who is concerned about terrors for children. It is the duty of all of us, whoever we are and whatever our political faiths may be, to defend our constitution and all it stands for with all the strength we can possibly command. I therefore make no apology for attempting to do exactly that today.

My personal position on these matters is well known in this House. I was opposed to Britain's signature to the treaty of Rome. I believed it was not in the best interests of this nation, nor in accordance with our historic tradition. Policy alternatives were open to us. I see no reason to change my mind about my decision. In signing the treaty of Rome we abandoned some flexibility in dealing with our own affairs and in negotiating our position in the world in matters of foreign policy and trade, and that I am sure was a mistake. Instead, we have now taken on board a new rigidity of discipline in foreign policy and trade matters which in the end I believe will serve this country less well than a more flexible position would have done.

There it is; the matter has been decided by an overwhelming vote in the House and in this country. The task of all of us now is to endeavour to make the European Community a more effective instrument, if we can. That is exactly what we should be talking about now and that is why I believe the Bill is so wrong.

Why the devil are we talking about constitutional matters at this stage? There is immense impatience in this country with the European Community and the way in which it conducts its practical affairs. If we want to get the country behind the European Community, all our energies should be devoted to making it much more effective, by reforming, for example, the common agricultural policy, by bringing some sense into the way in which the Community deals with its cash, and by achieving greater co-ordination, as my right hon. and learned Friend has argued, in matters of trade and foreign policy. I believe that our priorities now are entirely wrong. We should not be wasting time on constitutional matters when there is so much to do practically.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hope that when my right hon. Friend addresses these matters he will focus on the point that the central features of the Bill are designed to make the institutional changes so that faster progress can be made so that there can be more effective co-operation. He may not agree with the method, but those are our objectives.

Sir Edward du Cann: It is a most extraordinary thing that that is exactly what has not been happening. If there were an attractive record of progress and co-operation, I should have more faith in my right hon. and learned Friend's protestations.

My point is really very simple. I believe that we are giving our discussions the wrong emphasis and that we are going for the wrong priorities. In that way, we are being tactless, because the country generally will regard us as impractical, to say the least. There may well be a case for improving procedures, as my right hon. and learned Friend argues, but I do not believe the country is ready yet to make the substantial constitutional changes that are now proposed. For instance, this is not the time to agree to any derogation of our national sovereignty. I was very surprised at the exchanges my right hon. and learned Friend had with some of my hon. Friends on the subject of the Luxembourg agreement. I do not know whether hon. Members have had the opportunity to refer to the admirable reference sheet on the Bill, produced by the Library, but I draw attention to a paragraph on page 7 which makes a striking point. This is not produced by any partisan group; it is a factual report. The paragraph states:

"The legal fragility of the Luxembourg agreement was demonstrated in April 1982."

That is the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) was making. It continues:

"The Council then adopted EEC agricultural prices for the coming year by majority vote, despite the demand of Britain that adoption should be delayed until a settlement was reached on the budgetary situation."

That matter was of vital national interest to us, yet it was ruled that, since the majority vote was in accordance with treaty provisions, the Council regulation stood and took legal effect. Many of us felt that we might just as well not have had the Luxembourg agreement at all. Derogation of national sovereignty while the affairs of the European Community are in such a mess practically has gone far enough and should go no further.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend agree that the problem lies not necessarily in the workings of the Luxembourg compromise but more in the scrutiny arrangements that take place in the House? It is a matter of great importance that we manage to organise our affairs here to ensure that we have proper control over things done in our names in the working groups in the Council of Parliamentary Representatives and thereby through the Ministers themselves.

Sir Edward du Cann: I would not disagree at all with my hon. Friend if he says that we should strengthen our scrutiny arrangements in this House. Indeed, I have pressed hard for that to be done, as he will recall.

I also noted what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said about the commitment to European union. He said that this sort of thing is always said. I believe that it is said too often, and that people should stop saying it. If we go on saying it, the country will believe that that is what we really seek. However, it is not the view of the majority of hon. Members that that is a correct objective. The less said about it in future the better. Right hon. and hon. Members and members of the Government shold make that clear at every possible opportunity.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that union means something north of the border, and certainly in Northern Ireland; it is something we care deeply about. This afternoon an explanation was given why it was right to call the European Assembly a Parliament. Would it not be correct to assume that, if we continue to use the word "union" in the way it has been used and is being used, we Scots will be justified in thinking that the word means union as we understand it?

[Mr. Bill Walker]

Sir Edward du Cann: I think that that is a wise observation. I believe that my hon. Friend does well to remind us all, wheresoever the word is applied in the United Kingdom, of our Unionist tradition.

We should not now be giving substantial new powers to what is still called the Assembly. I do not believe that it was ever suggested that that was what would be achieved so soon, nor do I believe that the Assembly is properly equipped to exercise those new powers at present. If it is ultimately intended in this Parliament to give these powers, let us come clean with the electorate and say that that is the position. These important steps in that direction at this time are hopelessly premature.

I find it extraordinary that the European Court receives as much attention as it does. If it has some useful function to perform for private citizens in this country, there must be some lack in our judicial system, and I should like to see that rectified. I dislike very much the idea of a supranational court and I would do nothing to see that cause advanced at this stage.

Mr. Jackson: Like all other hon. Members, I accept my right hon. Friend's sincerity. He argues that it is a matter of choosing the right moment. Can he tell us what are the circumstances in which he thinks it would be appropriate in future to take the steps that he suggests we now defer?

Sir Edward du Cann: If the European Community were to show itself effective in running its own affairs and adopt practical policies for instance in agriculture, in which the population generally has some faith and belief, and if there were a genuine spirit of working together in foreign affairs, perhaps one could say that we should move on to other things. However, as the world knows, that is not the situation. The population of this country is extremely impatient with the way in which the European Community conducts its affairs. In endeavouring to press on too early with such important constitutional changes, we risk ridicule.

I believe that commitments to monetary union would be hopelessly premature. What we should be aiming to do, surely, is to popularise the EEC by making it effective. That is what my right hon. and hon. Friends should be devoting their attention to.

Since the treaty of Rome was adopted by its original signatories, much has changed. The United Kingdom has joined the European Community. More recently, there has been the accession of Greece, Spain and Portugal. No doubt the House is very pleased to see how the Community is developing in numbers.

However, the original considerations that led to the establishment of the Community have changed entirely. One could see every reason why France and Germany should come together in the years immediately after the war. No doubt there was a sigh of relief throughout Europe, and perhaps throughout the civilised world, when that happened. However, the worldwide interests of our friends in Greece are very different from those of the United Kingdom. Again, the interests of Spain and Portugal are very different from the interests of Germany, Italy and Greece.

Instead of endeavouring to drive the Community forward along old-fashioned tram lines adopted to serve an earlier situation, is it not perhaps time that we took a fresh look at the scene in order to decide whether important provisions should be added to the treaty?

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Sabotage.

Sir Edward du Cann: That would not be sabotage at all. We are talking about evolution and development. Let us evolve in tune with the times. Let us not automatically assume that an old pattern is appropriate for today. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend and the Government will take that suggestion seriously.

I am not sure, either, that it is appropriate that the Committee stage of the House should be taken in the usual way. I suggest that the Bill is an admirable case for submission to one of the Special Standing Committees, the procedure for which was adopted during the last Parliament. Many detailed matters require consideration in connection with the Bill, and it would be appropriate for evidence to be taken from outside.

A large section in the centre of my right hon. and learned Friend's speech was taken up with technical and trade matters. I am sure that we are unanimous in our agreement that we need to make the European Community more effective. That being so, it would be no bad thing to call in outside experts to advise us about the constitutional and other developments contained in the Bill. I hope that that suggestion will commend itself to my right hon. and learned Friend.

For the reasons that I have endeavoured to advance, it is essential that the House should dedicate itself to making the European Community arrangements more effective. I do not believe, therefore, that it is timely that we should be discussing, let alone deciding, a measure such as this. I wish with all my heart that the Government would withdraw it.

5.45 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I greatly respect the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), but I deeply disagree with him. As a citizen of the United Kingdom — and indeed one of Scottish origin, as may be visually perceived—I am entitled to take a critical view of the constitution of the country in which I live, just as much as the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to suggest that he wishes that constitution to evolve extremely slowly or perhaps not to change much at all. I want to move faster; the right hon. Gentleman wants to move more slowly. That is a fair difference. However, the right hon. Gentleman should give me and others like me the right to our views.

I take a very critical view of our country and its constitution, of the degree to which we are properly democratic and of our failure to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the European Community. I should like to begin with two relevant quotations. The first is from the solemn declaration on European union, to which the Foreign Secretary referred. It was signed at Stuttgart in 1983 by the Prime Minister, among others. The preamble states:

"The Heads of State or Governments of Members States of the European Communities meeting within the European Council resolved to continue the work begun on the basis of the Treaties of Paris and Rome and to create a united Europe, which is more than ever necessary in order to meet the dangers of the world situation, capable of assuming the responsibilities incumbent on it by virtue of its political role, its economic potential and its manifold links with other peoples."

Paragraph 4(3) of the declaration also stated that the heads of state or Government would subject the declaration to a general review as soon as progress achieved towards European unification justified such action, but not later than five years from the signature of the declaration—in other words, by June 1988.

I am not sure whether the present measure is regarded as a step in that direction or whether—as the Foreign Secretary seemed to suggest — although declarations about union take place from time to time, behind the rhetoric, we must move in a practical manner. I want us to move in a timed manner. It is now generally accepted that the Single Act does not do much to further the aim of European union. That is the view of the European movement in the United Kingdom, as the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) will confirm. It is also the view of the international European movement, which has passed a resolution to that effect.

What is the Liberal position? From 10 to 11 April——

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Cash rose——

Sir Russell Johnston: Patience. If the hon. Gentlemen will wait a moment, I will tell them.

On 10 and 11 April the 10th congress of European Liberal Democrats was held in Catania. I moved a resolution on the European Single Act on behalf not only of the British Liberal party but of the German Free Democratic party, the Dutch National Democratic Freedom party or VVD, the Italian Liberals and the Italian Republicans. The motion was passed unanimously with no dissent from any of the Liberal parties in the European Community. It therefore represents the position of Liberals in the Community.

The resolution stated that the congress

"endorses the European Parliament's critical assessment of the Single Act and confirms the opinion that the amendments to the EEC Treaty proposed therein are insufficient to achieve the development of the political Union so necessary to the European peoples, leaving, for example, foreign, security and monetary policy solely to intergovernmental cooperation, nor are they sufficient to confer on the European Parliament the legislative and budgetary powers appropriate to an Assembly elected by universal suffrage"— even if that suffrage is, at least in our country, flawed—

"or to transform the EEC Commission into an effective European executive;

Reaffirms its support for a European Union with adequate competences in the fields of foreign, security and monetary policies, and in which the Parliament has joint legislative powers with the Council. Restates its commitment to a uniform electoral system for the EP based on the principle of proportional representation and invites the Committee preparing the 1989 elections to maintain these goals as top priorities in their work.

Welcomes the programme of Action for the completion of the internal market by 1992 put forward by the Commission and endorsed by the Single Act, but emphasises the fact that unless the Council of Ministers returns to the practice of taking its decisions by majority vote, even this more limited goal is also doomed to remain merely a pious wish".

I see that the Foreign Secretary is about to leave. I would very much like to ask him to comment on one paragraph.

The resolution went on:

"Welcomes the Dutch Presidency's proposal to amend the Council statutes so that the European Commission or a minimum of 3 member states would suffice to oblige the Council to proceed directly to a vote in all those cases where the Treaty provides for majority approval".

I understand—the Foreign Secretary can correct me but he did not mention it in his speech—that the Dutch Presidency, which is in control until the end of June, has proposed at the Council that this could be done through the standing orders of the Council which can be changed by majority vote. That would be a considerable step forward. I do not expect the Foreign Secretary to say anything about that now but I wonder if there is a possibility of the Minister mentioning it when she replies.

The resolution concluded by saying:

"Invites the Member States Governments to approve this proposal without delay, overcoming any opposition which may be raised"—

they used a rather gentle phrase—

"by some more reticent members."

On the face of it, one could say that the approach by the Council of Ministers in Stuttgart in 1983 was very much the same as that of the Liberals in Catania in 1986. In reality there is a deep difference. The Single European Act is not a step backwards. That is good. However, it is a great disappointment. It seems almost like a sidestep.

For the Council of Ministers the Single European Act proposes majority voting on a limited number of topics largely connected with measures, as the Foreign Secretary said, to establish an internal market but not, as he confirmed, mobility of labour or health regulations. Both, especially the latter, have been used to hold up imports between European countries. I found the Secretary of State unpersuasive in his remarks on that. One cannot just say, "We will have majority voting where it suits us, but not where it might not suit us." One would not get anywhere that way. The Dutch proposal to which I have referred is at least a practical one.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, as an island, we have a rather special position to protect with regard to certain health matters? Therefore, we need to have the right to veto certain specific proposals which reflect that character of our nation.

Sir Russell Johnston: That is utter nonsense. The idea that because one is on an island one has a different view on health is nonsense. My goodness, the Cheviot hills are a border between England and Scotland. We have strong views on health.

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is right that we reserve our position on animal health regulations in order to prevent such things as rabies? That is, of course, protected under the measures which the Government are proposing.

Sir Russell Johnston: That is right. Surely it is also right to seek positively to reach harmonisation on health regulations — although, naturally, on a basis not of reducing standards but of maintaining them at the best level. I accept that.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): One could never guarantee that.

Sir Russell Johnston: That will be guaranteed, because that is what one negotiates with one's partners. There is no doubt that health regulations have, at times, been used as an excuse.

Mr. Bill Walker: Chickens.

Sir Russell Johnston: Indeed, and I think that the French were up to some tricks. We have all been at it and it does not help the cohesion of the Community at all.

The Single European Act proposes that the Parliament should be allowed a second opportunity to voice an opinion on a range of subjects related to the internal market. That looks as if the Parliament's powers are being increased. However, that extension is deceptive. Once the Council of Ministers has discussed a measure and reached a view, it is now required to give the Parliament a chance to express a view. If the Parliament does not give an opinion within three months, the Council of Ministers can go ahead anyway.

If the Parliament does not agree with the Council and proposes amendments, those amendments can be accepted by the Council of Ministers only by unanimous voting, which weakens the position of Parliament. That contrasts with the fact that Commission recommendations, in certain circumstances are passed by majority voting within the Council of Ministers.

The Dutch have been very good in respect of the European Community. They are currently suggesting that each member state should agree that they will never support the unanimous vote on a decision in the Council of Ministers unless it has the support of the Parliament. That is a very moderate proposition. I hope that that is the sort of proposition that the Government would be prepared to agree to.

I should now like to refer to the two amendments. There is a damp amendment and a dry amendment.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman referred earlier to his position as spokesman for the Liberal party. Are we to understand, from the reply that he gave to an earlier intervention, that he is to explain the position of the alliance in respect of this Bill? No representative from the Social Democratic party is present and it would be a matter of real interest to have some idea where the alliance stands in relation to a Bill which is so important to the United Kingdom.

Sir Russell Johnston: Firstly, the absence of members of the Social Democratic party shows their confidence in my good self. Secondly, it is clear that the attention span of the hon. Gentleman is somewhat short. If the hon. Gentleman searches his memory, he will recall that he has asked me the same question many times before and I have given the same answer time after time. I have told him that, if he goes to the Library and finds a copy of the alliance manifesto for the European election of 1984, he will find all the answers that he wishes. I will not say any more than that.

I disagree with the first amendment, but I am disappointed with the second amendment. It contains the words

"whilst accepting the need for a Bill which enacts the Single European Act, without eroding national prerogatives or changing the substantive balance of powers between the Community institutions".

One cannot have that. That means no change. Unfortunately, I am speaking before anyone has had the opportunity to speak to the amendment. I shall be very interested in what they say because I cannot understand what the amendment adds to or substracts from the Government's proposal.

The outright nationalistic amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Taunton seeks to do two things. It states that the Bill

"undermines the national right of veto."

We have been over that old story repeatedly. We cannot expect to achieve an internal market if we sustain that position. What is the national interest? Unless Europe becomes a political Europe rather than a nationalist compromise, it will never achieve coherent political positions. I suggest to the right hon. Member for Taunton that to say that one's attitude to agriculture, fishing or industry is determined primarily by whether one is British, Italian or French, rather than by whether one is a Liberal, a Conservative or a Socialist, is to talk political nonsense.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman has been consistent and, at times, courageous. He will remember that one of the major platforms during the referendum campaign in Scotland concerned the veto — what it would achieve and how it could be retained. There was no question of it being qualified or watered down. The hon. Gentleman remembers the campaign as clearly and as well as I do. He remembers how a majority of people were persuaded.

Sir Russell Johnston: I never thought that that made any sense. The people who suggested at that time that it made sense have changed their minds. Times change, and there is no getting around that. The concept of a national right of veto presumes that somehow the British view of a political matter is coherent. The Prime Minister says now what our right of veto is, but the alliance might, if the heavens were gentle and understanding, or the Leader of the Oppostion might be in a position to do the same. None of those three would necessarily define a proper national stance. They would simply define a transitory political position in the United Kingdom. If we want the advantages of size and co-operation gained by being a member of the European Community, it is right and proper that we should take political decisions on a Community-wide basis.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman, who is a fair person, think that there was a great deal of merit and logic in the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Edward du Cann)? He said that this was not a constitutional revolution, but that it was wrong to give additional majority powers to the Community before it had solved some of the problems by using its existing powers. Is it not reasonable to say to the Community, "Use the powers to solve some of the problems you have before you come back and ask for more."

Mr. Marlow: That makes sense.

Sir Russell Johnston: The hon. Member for Northampton, North suggests that it makes sense, but that severely devalues its impact upon me. I say to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that the reason that this limited proposal has been made and all the arguments have taken place in Milan, Luxembourg, and so on is that the decision-making processes of the European Community have not been working. More and more decisions are being delayed. The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs confirmed that it takes 17 years for the Community to decide on common qualifications for architects.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Sir Russell Johnston: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I must point out that time is passing.

Mr. Marlow: How will that make it easier for us to reach sensible conclusions on the common agricultural policy? What will the Bill do to bring about changes in the nonsensical common agricultural policy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the House that interventions are made only at the expense of speeches by other hon. Members. A number of hon. Members are waiting to speak. I am making a note of the number of interventions made by hon. Members.

Sir Russell Johnston: The second aspect of the amendment concerns the power of the European Assembly. Those who support the amendment do not wish its power to be extended. They say that the Bill

"increases the power of the European Assembly".

If one believes in democracy, one must have an elected body to take care of Community legislation.

I listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). I notice that he has left the Chamber temporarily, but he is represented by his Scottish colleague the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). Although the hon. Member for Hamilton told us what he would do, he failed to tell us the Labour party's view on Britain's place in the European Community. For a long time, the Labour party bitterly opposed Britain's entry into the Community. It seems to be moving from that position, but is not clear where it is moving to. I say to the hon. Member for Northampton, North, who is an expert on these matters, that it is simplistic to argue that the CAP must be reformed forthwith, but, as the hon. Member for Hamilton stated, institutional reform must be low on our order of priorities. As the old song said, you cannot have one without the other. If CAP expenditure were decreased, an effective regional policy would be required to take care of the problems that would be created. If there is to be a harnessing of economic forces for the creation of jobs, as the hon. Member for Hamilton suggested, fiscal and social harmonisation and common political answers would be required. That issue must be faced. At the moment it is not being faced. It is being fudged by the Labour party.

I agreed with the hon. Member for Hamilton when he castigated the Foreign Secretary for his bland references to political co-operation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman suggested, in the way that he is very good at doing, that Britain has been the country which has taken the initiative to achieve political co-operation in the European Community. That is not true. The hon. Gentleman pointed out, rightly, that it was remarkable that the Foreign Secretary should say that. Admittedly, as a consequence of yesterday's ministerial meeting, the Foreign Secretary was able to announce some progress regarding Libya. The events leading up to that were not indicative of a proper degree of co-operation. South Africa's position was quoted. UNESCO was a classic case in which all our European colleagues were saying "No". In my view, there was no proper form of consultation. That seemed to be incredible. We must work these things out in a more satisfactory way.

The Single European Act contains no timetabling procedure. The Council tries to agree on a position but if it is unable to do so, it puts it off. Very often, there is no need to use a veto. It is the prospect of its use that creates the delay. I believe that the European Parliament was right, in the Spinelli draft Act, to argue for a firm timetable on decision making. A timetable is essential if these matters are to be speeded up.

The right hon. Member for Taunton said that we are moving too fast. I think that we are moving too slowly. Although my colleagues and I will support the Bill in the Lobby if there is a Division, we make it clear that we would have liked much more and we shall continue to press for much more.

6.9 pm

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), the Opposition's Front-Bench spokesman, spoke about splits between the United States and Europe. That is hardly surprising. At one time, there was talk about the twin pillars of the Atlantic Alliance, but the reality is that there is one pillar, the United States, and a pile of building blocks on this side of the Atlantic. That does not resemble a pillar at all. The countries of western Europe do not stand equal with the United States. Until they are united more coherently there will be no need for the United States to treat them as equals.

It is only in unity that Europe has achieved some economic strength. It has been said that Europe has become an economic giant but a political pigmy. There is some truth in that. We have not produced a political institution. However, when the Community has stumbled, all too unwittingly, into various forms of trade wars—even with the United States—it has not always come off second-best. We are strong economically, but we are not strong enough in other spheres. It is only through unification that the Community will be strong enough to have a voice on the world stage and be able to meet the economic challenges from the United States and Japan and the obvious political and military challenges of the Soviet bloc.

Some hon. Members have put before us a will o' the wisp which has long gone—the idea of an independent Britain. We heard faint echoes of the 19th century in their speeches but that concept has gone. They cannot offer a future independent Britain. Britain and the other European nations will, perforce, be colonies, albeit economic colonies, of the United States and Japan. If the worst comes to the worst, European nations might be political colonies of the Soviet bloc. If we wish to survive, there is no choice but unification.

When my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary takes over the presidency of the Council of Ministers he should bear in mind that, to implement the Cockfield report, we should join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. The time has long passed when we should have entered. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will announce that decision when he takes over the presidency, as that would seem a suitable moment to do so. I am prepared to wait another nine weeks for that announcement but it should have been made years ago.

The completion of the single market is important for Britain, especially with regard to services. Implementing Cockfield by 1992 will mean vast changes in Britain and in other Community countries.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: It will not happen.

Mr. Knowles: If my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) had his way, it would not happen. It is possible, but it depends on political will power. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has made it clear that the Bill is primarily concerned with those necessary changes.

I wish to comment on the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) who has, unfortunately, left the Chamber. My right hon. Friend exposed some of the underlying attitudes which have led to our difficulties in the Community. He said that he opposed our entry into the Community. My right hon. Friend said that he was not against evolution but against the pace. If the pace was slower we would be at a standstill. The Community's movements are so slow that they are glacier-like.

My right hon. Friend also claimed that Britain is impatient with the Community. That is an argument I have heard before. It is argued that Britain is a practical nation, that we want to get down to the nuts and bolts of things, yet we are linked up with all of these airy-fairy European intellectuals who exchange words. The continental airy-fairy intellectuals have increased their gross national products at a remarkably faster rate than this practical nation has managed to do in the past 40 years. As politicians, we ought to believe that words are important. They are our business.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Can my hon. Friend tell me of any other area of the world which, in the past three years, has had a poorer rate of job growth — with the possible exceptions of El Salvador and Tibet—than the European Economic Community?

Mr. Knowles: That is because the Community is splintered into 12 separate markets. If one separated the United States into 50 separate markets they would not have had a growth in jobs. If we wish to emulate the job growth in the United States we must emulate their economic structure.

It has been said that Britain should say less about European union to our European partners. That is not true. Its exact import may vary in different countries but it is an aim that is shared by all European partners. We signed the treaty of European union, the object of which, as outlined in the preamble, was to produce an ever closer union among the people of Europe. Britain also signed the Strasbourg declaration. The concept is important and our European partners expect us to deliver on the treaties.

There has been endless mention of the common agricultural policy. The truth about the agricultural policy — this is sure to produce a laugh — is that the agricultural policy has been too successful. Thirty years ago the idea that Europe could feed itself seemed a pipe dream. That is the only area in which we have practised a single market and it is the one area where food costs have fallen and where we have massive food surpluses and problems.

Thirty years ago over 25 per cent. of the people worked on the land. They have been shifted off the land but there has been increased productivity. The success of the common agricultural policy was based on the single market and if we had a single market for our industries we could produce similar results. We must press forward.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. Friend have the same idea about stockpiling motor cars? Can he give us his further thoughts about state aids and subsidies, of which he plainly approves on a European scale, which would resuscitate Britain? I am sure his views will be much appreciated by Opposition Members.

Mr. Knowles: I cannot recall any period in postwar Britain when there has not been some form of state subsidy. Even in that haven of free enterprise, the United States, the biggest single subsidy is given to agriculture. Some of those employed on the land have to be shifted off and that has social consequences. We must pursue an agricultural policy which has social as well as economic aims. That is inevitable.

Mr. Budgen: Is my hon. Friend saying that we do not have a dreadful lesson to learn from the common agricultural policy and that the same principles should be extended to industry? Would he favour doubling the price of motor cars and excluding all imported ones? That would be the result of applying that principle.

Mr. Knowles: One would apply those principles to protect agriculture but not to industry. One uses different horses for different courses. Certain hon. Members claim they oppose the principle of subsidies, but when the industry concerned is in their constituency it is a different matter. I have not seen many hon. Members who will argue that in principle and then face their electorate and tell them that they are in favour of closing their factory down. State intervention can be used, from time to time, to give an industry breathing time to sort itself out.

Successive Governments have used subsidies. Surely nobody is pretending that the United States Government have not used their vast purchasing power to bolster American industry. The Boeing 707 swept the board because the development costs of the B52 bomber were written off. Nobody could compete with that. Those who want to compete at the top end of technology must do what others do, but better. It is nonsense to imagine that we can live in a cocoon. Reality must break in.

I do not accept the idea that any increase in power or influence for the European Parliament necessarily affects Westminster adversely. The power does not reside at Westminster or at Strasbourg. It has disappeared to the Executive in the middle-national Governments, the Commission and a supra-national Council, which is the only legislature that I can think of which meets in secret. It is not a democratic system. I favour the democratic system and would like Strasbourg and Westminster to exercise more control.

Parliament does not influence European matters practically because we do not give the Select Committee the power to do so. I have argued this case before. There are members of that Committee in the Chamber. We have argued time and again that we must reconsider how we scrutinise European legislation. That is especially true in view of the proposed changes. At the moment, the Select Committee considers matters when they are so far down the road that we can do nothing about them. We do not have close relations with British Members of the European Parliament; we do not have the close liaison such as the French and Germans have. The House loses as a result. We fail to influence European affairs to the country's benefit because we are bound up with petty jealousies.

In France, for example, a Deputy from the French National Assembly may become a Member of the European Parliament, return to Paris as a Minister and then go to Brussels as a Commissioner. The two institutions are closely knit. A line is drawn between the two in British politics. What happens in France might be called patronage but it protects French interests. I am in favour of protecting British interests. We must be realistic. We should not lock ourselves in a cupboard, put our hands over our eyes and say, "The bogy man will go away." The world is not like that.

Can my hon. Friend the Minister assure us that the Government are willing to reconsider the powers and status of the Select Committee? That has become an urgent matter. We must grapple with realities. All too often, we trample over the ground that we have trampled over ever since we entered the Community. Other countries have moved on. Their political perspectives are shifting. If we are not careful, we shall be left behind wondering what everyone is talking about and why they are impatient with us.

Mr. Dykes: As this applies to economic and political issues——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Member must address the House. I cannot hear what he is saying.

Mr. Dykes: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was trying to decide which way to face.

Mr. Marlow: You always are!

Mr. Dykes: I now realise that I should not have said that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) is speaking persuasively about political and economic co-operation. I am sure that many hon. Members agree with everything that he has said. Does he agree that it is ominous and nerve-racking for Britain that, because of the failure to get stuck in and to work to create a strong Community, Italy has, for the first time, overtaken the United Kingdom, whereas it was always the weakest of the big four? Is that not a good example of a country seizing its opportunities and doing well economically and politically because of political will?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That has happened before and it will continue to happen. Britain must accept that it made a decision about its future when it entered the Community. We should stop haggling in the corner over private quarrels and ensure that the Community works and that we get benefits out of it.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I listened to the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) with increasing incredulity. His was the first openly federalist speech of the day, although we have had a few others in previous debates. I hope that, when the hon. Gentleman loses his seat at the next election—he has a marginal—he may have done himself some good with the British European movement.

The Government admitted last year that the Bill would not have been necessary if they had not been defeated by the increasingly federalist sentiment which guides some of our colleagues in the EEC. I am not sure whether it was inadvertent or deliberate, but the Government seem to have been blind to the growing trend towards federalism and integration in the EEC.

I tabled a written question to the Minister's predecessor on 8 May 1985 asking about the phrase "European integration" which had been used in a Government document supplied to a summit meeting in June 1984. The Minister replied that the phrase denoted co-operation of EEC states. A Minister who cannot distinguish between integration and co-operation is either stupid or trying deliberately to mislead. In view of that Minister's reputation, I shall leave the House to decide.

The Government are accepting a further loss of sovereignty by the extension of majority voting. We no longer have faith even in the Luxembourg compromise —the so-called veto—which might have existed before last year's events. We had one defeat on the use of the Luxembourg compromise in April or May 1982 concerning CAP prices and the link with our budget contribution. We were outvoted and refused use of the Luxembourg compromise. That was a defeat for Britain at the hand of other members of the Council.

There was a more serious breach in the Luxembourg compromise concerning the CAP price negotiations last year. The Germans vetoed a cereal price reduction whereas, under the rules, cereal prices for the previous year should have been continued. The veto was overruled not by other Council members but by the Commission. The Commission arrogated to itself the right to overrule a veto in the Council. That is even more disturbing than what happened in 1982.

The Bill also accepts a great extension of competence to the EEC. I am surprised that nobody but the Foreign Secretary has mentioned that. If the Bill is passed, the Community will have competence in environmental matters, in research and development and in other areas which until now have been outside its area of competence, as laid down in the basic Community treaties. The extension of Community competence has a rachet effect. Its competence must be at the expense of the legislative and economic competence of individual member states. When powers have been given up they can never be regained — at least, not so long as one remains a member of the Community. The rachet effect is one of the great disadvantages of the Single European Act and of this Bill which gives legislative effect to it.

The Bill also gives more power and, what is even more important, more status to the European Assembly. The treaty of Rome referred in many instances to the Commission and the Council consulting the Assembly, but the words that are now used are "in co-operation with." Those words must mean something. There has been a change in the wording, which will enhance the status and the powers of the Assembly.

Last, but by no means least, in this Bill the Government accept the idea that indirect taxation should be harmonised under article 17. There is a qualification: that that harmonisation must be essential for the workings of the internal market. But what form of indirect taxation is not essential to the workings of the internal market? Every form of indirect taxation is essential. Therefore, the qualification is no safeguard. The Bill accepts, as does the Single European Act, that ultimately there shall be harmonisation between member states over indirect taxation. I am surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has agreed to it.

As for the change of name of the Assembly, Conservative Members ask, on behalf of the federalists both inside and outside Parliament, "What's in a name?" Right hon. and hon. Members have forgotten that the name of the Assembly was changed by the European Parliament in a resolution of 31 March 1962. Because of their federalist leanings, that change was recognised gradually by the other institutions. However, what would be the reaction if the European Council of Ministers took it upon itself to change its name to the European Cabinet? Would right hon. and hon. Members adopt a sanguine attitude towards that change of name? Of course they would not.

Names have a meaning. They are also symbolic. The symbolism involved in changing the name is probably more important than the immediate practical effect. The Assembly, which is now to be called officially the Parliament, will try to arrogate to itself the powers of a real Parliament as distinct from the Assembly's present advisory and supervisory role under the relevant section of the treaty. I shall continue to take the advice of the former Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on how to use these terms. In reply to my written question about the terminology on 15 March 1984, he said:

"Whatever terminology is used, the nature of the institution is not affected. We shall continue"— that is, the Government—

"to use the term 'Assembly' in legal texts or"—

I put emphasis on this—

"where it is necessary to distinguish that institution from the Westminster Parliament."—[Official Report, 19 March 1984; Vol. 56, c. 340].

When this institution has changed its name officially to "Parliament", it will be even more necessary to use the term "Assembly" in our debates to distinguish it from the proceedings in this House of the Westminster Parliament.

The Assembly has been granted a large number of new powers. However, it is not a responsible Parliament, such as the national Parliaments of the member states. According to its record, it is a most irresponsible body. Last year it passed a motion that rejected the idea of budget discipline in the EC. This year it could not agree upon any form of reform of the common agricultural policy. It produced a document that was eventually voted down, but that document was shot through with contradictions. During the agricultural price review debate last year in the Strasbourg institution, the Assembly argued for a 3·5 per cent. average increase in agricultural prices. That was at a time when even the federalists in this Chamber accepted the need to rein in the financial effects of the expansion of the CAP.

The Assembly is looking for a high profile role. It is increasingly bloated with its own pretensions. I refer to its attitude to the Single European Act which was grudgingly accepted as the minimum. It was probably very much in tune with the comments of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) who, quoting from the proceedings of the Liberal assembly on the European basis, said that this is a very small step indeed.

Much more significant about the Assembly's pretensions is its attitude to the 1986 Community budget. It rejected the Council's budget and tried to arrogate to itself the power to increase expenditure. That is outside its powers under the treaty of Rome. It is also outside its power under the Single European Act. Furthermore—this was an even more heinous crime on its part—it tried to arrogate to itself the power to increase the rate of VAT from own resources within the 1·4 per cent. ceiling and the power to determine the taxation of individual citizens in member countries. The House debated this matter a few months ago, and I shall not go into the details. However, it shows the nature of the institution. It wants there to be more expenditure and to get its hands on taxation, but it does not yet have those powers.

My last word on the Assembly, at least in this debate, is that we are seeing the beginning of a struggle between the Assembly and the Council, with the Commission openly backing the Assembly in its desire to get more power away from the Council and, therefore, away from national Parliaments, particularly over financial control. The same kind of struggle took place in England during the later middle ages. There was a struggle between the English Parliament and the Crown over the one vital issue that involved power in the community and its society, the power of taxation. That struggle was eventually won by the English Parliament. We must hope that there will be a different outcome to the struggle that is now beginning in the European Community.

The Bill gives great encouragement to the federalists in our midst and outside. The federalists are not just the people on the fringe. When Mr. Gaston Thorn was President of the European Commission he made a speech to the European Assembly in February 1984 in which he said:

"Parliament's role in decision-making is not commensurate with the legitimacy the direct elections gave it. Parliament is an expression of the deep-rooted aspirations of the people of Europe. As such, it should have a much larger say in policy-making. I would like to see it sharing legislative and budgetary powers with the Council."

The federalists in this Chamber will applaud those sentiments. However, those right hon. and hon. Members who do not wish the EEC to follow a federal direction but who believe that this is inevitable unless it is strongly resisted in this country and in other countries will take careful note of that warning.

There is also a passage in the Dooge report that was opposed by the Minister of State at the time. It says:

"A Parliament elected by universal suffrage cannot, if the principles of democracy are logically applied, continue to be restricted to a consultative role or to having cognizance of only a minor part of Community expenditure. That dooms it to oblivion or over-statement, and more often than not to both."

The Minister entered a reservation, but it was only a technical reservation. In the light of the Bill and the Single European Act, I believe that a majority of the Cabinet and the Government are convinced that gradually we should go down the federalist path, but that we should not speak too loudly about it for fear, to quote the Foreign Secretary's rather offensive words, "of putting terror into the children".

Mr. Cash: Recently, in reply to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"I do not believe in the concept of a united states of Europe, nor do I believe that it would ever be attainable."—[Official Report, 5 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 432.]

Mr. Deakins: I accept that. I too have that quotation. The Prime Minister may have said that, but I am afraid that she has said many things about her attitude to the EEC and in the course of time we have seen that she has changed her views. The Milan summit was a classic example of that.

My third point of caution about giving encouragement to federalists in the Bill relates to the draft treaty of union which was considered by the Assembly not so long ago. I shall not weary the House by reading out some of the appalling——

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The distinction that my hon. Friend makes between an assembly and a parliament might be seen as a confusion between the two by other hon. Members. Would that confusion be worsened when we obtain an elected Scottish legislature if it is called an assembly or a parliament?

Mr. Deakins: The Referendum Act 1975 referred to an "assembly". That would not have led—I see Scottish Members assenting to that proposition — to any confusion at all. If there are parliaments in different parts of the same institution, there is bound to be confusion between them regardless of their legislative and financial roles.

Let me mention briefly the draft treaty of union, which is horrifying. It has been rejected, but nevertheless it is, so to speak, in the wings waiting for a favourable moment to come forward. I do not agree with the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) who finds the pace of change too fast. I look at the destination and say that I do not want to get to that destination. I suspect that the majority of the British people, given the opportunity, would say the same.

There is nothing in the Bill to improve parliamentary control and scrutiny of Council decisions and treaty-making. I refer the House to the 16th report of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities in Session 1984-85, where that point was hammered home. I cannot believe that hon. Members would regard the other place as being a radical institution. Nevertheless, it said some excellent things about the inadequate nature of our scrutiny in the House. We also have the report of our Select Committee on European Legislation.

The Single European Act talks about harmonisation of external policies. It would be a serious mistake—I shall not necessarily carry even my hon. Friends with me on this —for us to co-ordinate our external policies with a club of rich nations, which they certainly are. That will not resolve the world's north-south problems. It would be much better to give greater prominence to using the Commonwealth in tackling those problems. Unfortunately, the Commonwealth is sadly neglected by all parties in the House and that is a pity.

What matters is not the military, economic or political power, as the Foreign Secretary and those who support him would have us believe, which lie behind particular policies, but whether a policy is right or wrong. If it is right it must be put forward irrespective of the power that one has to put behind it. The worst of all possible worlds would be to have policies that are decided by consensus in the Community. As we know, all convoys proceed at the pace of the slowest ship. I am afraid that those policies are just as likely to be highly inadequate or wrong as they are to be right.

This political co-operation is the politics of declaration. There have been about 30 declarations in recent years and they have had no perceptible impact on the course of world events. It is the politics of gesture by countries unwilling to accept their declining influence in the world. Incidentally, I accept that concept because Europe cannot go on dominating the world for the next few hundred years in the way that it has in the past 500 years.

My last comment is to my party. Our continued membership of the EEC, the Bill and what is involved in it, threaten the economic programme of the next Labour Government. There can be no restriction on capital movements. I refer hon. Members to the amendment to article 70 in the Single European Act. There will have to be a reduction of state aids. There can be no import control policy and there certainly can be no managed trade policy which would involve negotiations between this country and others in Europe or elsewhere. Our economic and financial policies will be subject to much greater interference, and indeed some of them will be set completely at nought by our continued membership and by the Bill. That is why we should all oppose it tonight.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have decided not to enforce the 10-minute limit, but if speeches are as long as they have been a good number of hon. Members will not be able to speak. Therefore, I ask for voluntary restraint.

6.44 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): I welcome the Bill and the way in which it was introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. I must confess that I have heard some of the speeches which have been made this afternoon before. I am not surprised that my right hon. and learned Friend was right when he said that anxieties would no doubt be expressed about the concept of European union.

European union means different things to different people, and it is hard to define. Reference has already been made to the preamble to the treaty which states simply, and commits us to,

"an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe."

That is something that I have always believed can only be achieved step by step with realism. There is no question in our minds of European union, or movement towards European union, meaning, ipso facto, the creation of a federalist state. Last year's report on European union presented by the House of Lords European Communities Committee rightly emphasised that that union, in the sense in which we talk about it and commit ourselves in the various documents, is not about some Utopian plan for a European federation. It is about how best we can, step by step, realistically bring about the aims of the Community so that its future success is assured.

I should have thought that all hon. Members could accept what my right hon. and learned Friend had to say in introducing the Bill and stating its purpose. It is simply to deepen and broaden the scope of European activities, to our mutual advantage. We do that in every sphere in which it is to the advantage of all the members of the Community to co-operate, because what they do together they can do more effectively than what they attempt to achieve on their own.

Of course, in that context it is right to review from time to time the provisions of the treaty of Rome. As General De Gaulle once said, treaties are like roses; they fade, they fade. The negotiation of an entirely new treaty of European union, which some have advocated, would have been doomed to disaster. That, as I understand it, is what our Ministers were saying at the time people were talking about a comprehensive new treaty. That is quite a different thing from the arrangements which were agreed at Luxembourg and which are to be embodied in the Bill.

The practical steps which were envisaged at the Luxembourg summit and are embodied in the Bill are both possible and useful. I warmly endorse what my right hon.

and learned Friend had to say, that the provisions in the Bill are admirably drafted to serve British interests no less than those of our European partners. There is nothing in the arrangements in Luxembourg, nothing in the Bill, which can do other than benefit the British interests that our Government have been seeking to protect within the Community.

Three areas of action will particularly benefit the United Kingdom, increase trade and so create jobs. First, I cannot understand how anybody could not welcome a timetable for the establishment of a genuine internal market in services as well as goods. It is perfectly obvious that we in the United Kingdom would benefit enormously from access to the Community markets for our various financial services, house mortgages, insurance and such matters. That access is bound to help us in every possible way.

Secondly, we must welcome the prospect of speedier and more effective decision-making. Finally—I attach special importance to this—we must welcome action to make Europe competitive in the new technologies. If, as the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) implied, that is widening the competence of the Community, so be it. The Community should be directly concerned with increasing European and therefore British competitiveness in new technologies and with the protection of the environment. The Opposition have made much of the importance of the environment and I recall my hon. Friend the Minister saying in March that pollution knows no frontiers. I should have thought that we would welcome European co-operation in those matters.

These are matters of common sense. Another matter of common sense from the British point of view is that, if we are to complete the internal market by 1992, it is essential that we increase the use of qualified majority voting.

As my right hon. and hon. Friends have explained, unanimity is still required for tax measures or such matters as movement of people or animals. It is important to emphasise that there are the safeguards that we need; for example, to protect an island against the introduction of rabies. Above all, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said, the so-called Luxembourg compromise—or the Luxembourg disagreement as some people have called it—for what it is worth, will remain as it is.

There may be arguments about the circumstances under which that agreement may be used. Some people may say that it has a legal frailty or that it did not cover—and I believe that it should not have covered—cases in which the veto was used for a purpose other than one which was under consideration. In other words, the veto should not be used to stop one policy simply to promote another. That is probably a misuse of the veto. However, that facility is present and it is there to protect a very important national interest. That must be a matter for argument from time to time.

The Bill and the agreement in Luxembourg are important steps to avoid unreasonable blocking of measures to liberalise trade or to introduce what many of us want—reforms in the operation of the CAP.

I was especially disappointed in the points made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow about increasing the competence of the Community in areas such as technology and the environment. If the Opposition believe in the speeches that they have made outside the House on these matters, they should be welcoming the provisions which increase the possibility of increased trade and create jobs and also increase the quality of life of the citizens of Europe.

Since when has the Labour party become so obstinately isolationist that it cannot even support measures to improve the quality of life and the environment? The tragedy of the last generation is that Europe has been slow to recognise the importance of scientific and information technology for economic development, growth and the creation of jobs. More than 20 years ago, I remember expressing my anxiety that, if we did not press at the very frontiers of science and technology, we would end up flogging hand-knitted Union Jacks to tourists.

I also remember as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Aviation sending to the then Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Macmillan, a United States report on space research which began: "This is no astronautic boon doggle." That was a curious phrase but it was the one that was used. The report stressed that there was a spin-off in advanced technology—for example, in computers. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), who intervenes in these matters, suggested that Concorde was a waste of money. However, if we had not produced a Concorde we would be even further behind in advanced technology.

The first minicomputer was produced 23 years ago. The United States and Japan immediately recognised the importance of that new technology. We have followed on, but we have all, especially the Opposition, tended to regard technological change as a threat to job creation instead of an opportunity for industrial and economic growth.

I was very encouraged when the European Council at Milan last year gave the go-ahead for the creation of a European technological community. The Council favoured

> "A close link between technological development and the effort to unify the internal market."

The Luxembourg package and the Bill take that idea a step further. There is now a better understanding that priority must be given to improving conditions for cross-frontier co-operation between companies in research and development.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Before my right hon. and learned Friend progresses too far on his points about technology, would he clarify his comment about the Bill helping to solve the problems of the CAP because of majority decisions? I understand that the Bill makes no change to CAP decisions and that on many of the issues, for example price-fixing, there is already majority voting.

Mr. Rippon: If the Bill makes no change, there will be no need for my hon. Friend to oppose it. I said that there is no change in the Luxembourg compromise but I hope that the arrangements that were agreed in Luxembourg, for which the Bill provides the foundations, will avoid the use of blocking precedents of the kind employed by the German Government last year.

The Bill puts down a marker that there should be a general understanding between Community members that the veto should be used only when there is a very important national interest involved.

I also welcome another matter to which the Government have given priority. That is the way in which the Commission and the Council have emphasised the importance of social and regional progress. Some reference has already been made to this and I believe that the development of the regional and social funds has been very important to the United Kingdom and especially to the north-east. Those who suggest that the Government have neglected those aspects of our interests are quite mistaken.

Measures are also needed to protect the environment, and fundamental freedoms and rights and to advance social and educational policies. Within that broad context, I welcome the proposals to give the European Parliament an increasing role in the European partnership.

The change of name is not of immense significance. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said, it recognises what has been happening, in that it is already called the European Parliament, although it does not have legislative powers. Earlier this month, at the Inter-Parliamentary Union conference, a proposal was put forward for a central American parliament. A legislative assembly was not contemplated. Instead, they wanted somewhere that Members of Parliament could discuss matters of mutual interest.

Whether we have an Assembly, a Parliament or a European Congress, its influence and powers will evolve in time according to whether it behaves sensibly. This House might have more influence and therefore more power if it occasionally conducted its affairs more sensibly. A parliamentary influence depends on the quality of debates. That is why the other place nowadays has a higher reputation in many quarters than we have.

The Bill simply changes the name, having regard to reality. It does not give greater powers. We can argue again about whether there should be co-operation or consulation but there will be better co-operation between the Council, the Commission and the Parliament if there is earlier consultation. One of the Parliament's troubles so far has been that matters come to the Parliament so late that its reactions tend to be negative rather than positive. If it could be consulted earlier, and brought into matters at an earlier stage, it would have a more useful role to play and would be more effective.

It is not disputed, as the Scrutiny Committee's report states, that "at the end of the day the European Parliament still has no power to insist and the last word remains with the Council."

The European Parliament will be listened to by national Parliaments only in so far as it uses its new influence successfully. In that sense, influence can lead to power.

In the course of a splendid and comprehensive speech on 5 March, my hon. Friend the Minister of State said:

"The third major area covered by the new treaty amendments is the environment . . . Pollution knows no boundaries."—[Official Report, 5 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 340.]

In that context I emphasise that there are many other matters where we should recognise that our horizon cannot and should not be limited by the boundaries of the European Community. I have never regarded Europe as the Europe of the Nine, the Ten or the Twelve. I regard the Council of Europe and its parliamentary assembly as the parent body.

It is important in our debates on Europe that we do not continue going over the old and stale ground of definition of terms. We must show that we as a country are concerned about the development of the European Community and of the other members of the European family. For example, we should not forget our partners in EFTA, bearing in mind that one of our reasons for joining the Community was to protect EFTA's interests.

Damage will be done and a danger will be posed in future if members of the European Community become so obsessed with their own economic problems and progress towards union or integration, however it is defined, that they neglect the wider Europe. We should not allow Europe to be split in two with a widening gap between states that are members of the Community and those that are not.

The Council of Europe, starved though it is of adequate financial resources, has a vital contribution to make in legal, social, education and cultural matters. I hope that we shall spend more time talking about the ways in which the Council of Europe and the European Community co-operate.

The parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe now provides the widest, indeed the only, European institutional framework, where elected Members of national Parliaments can meet and have discussions. The views of some Opposition Members might be changed if occasionally they talked to other European MPs and understood what they were trying to do in the European context.

I welcome the Luxembourg package and the Bill. I only hope that we never forget that what we are doing, to use Jean Monet's words, is to unite not states but people.

7.4 pm

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): As a former Member of the European Parliament, I cannot feel the same passions as some hon. Members on both sides of the House about the name of the institution. I find it extraordinary that so long after joining the European Community we are still arguing about whether the institution should be called an assembly or a parliament. The French have their Assembly, the Americans have their Congress and, as the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) said, there are other names which define various organisations throughout the world. I find it incredible that some in this House spend so much time arguing about what we should call the European Parliament.

As a former Member of the European Parliament, I should like to see it have more powers. I do not understand why we continue to argue in this place about the European Parliament's role. We should remember that its Members are elected as we are. If we believe in democracy, we must believe in giving powers to politicians who are democratically elected. It is inconceivable that anyone who has been elected to this place should argue about whether someone in another place should be given certain powers.

The European Parliament is criticised; it is said that it does not act in the right way, that it is too slow to react and that it does not make the right decisions. I find these criticisms strange. We cannot urge a horse to gallop while hobbling it at the same time. However, that is precisley what some hon. Members would like to happen. They wish to continue to criticise the European Parliament while constraining its powers.

I remind hon. Members on both sides of the House that there is a clause in the treaty of Rome which supports the redistribution of wealth between rich and poor. That was never contained in the EFTA treaty, of which we used to be so proud.

There are those who continue to talk about what we should do when we leave the European Community. I know that they do, but I should like to know what the options are. I should not like Britain to rejoin EFTA. We may be a long way from the goal of redistributing resources between rich and poor in the European Community, but there is a deal for that among many Members of that Parliament. If the European Parliament were given more powers and some of the Council's powers were taken from it, progress would be made.

Members of this place who were formerly Members of the European Parliament will remember working with parliamentarians of other nationalities from day to day. I can assure the House that that is a sobering experience. Initially I was opposed to the European Community, but I found after a period as a Member of the European Parliament that there were advantages in working with people of other nationalities from day to day. I wish that more Members of this place had had that experience; I shall be eternally grateful that I had it. It had a profound effect on me and it changed my attitudes towards the European Community.

As a member of the Socialist group, I had an advantage over members of some other groups. That is because the members of the Socialist group worked with parliamentarians from 10 countries. I shall be responsive, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to your appeal for short speeches and the constraint on time, because I remember that it was necessary to fight for the opportunity to speak for only three minutes in the European Parliament. The representatives of the other nations wanted to speak in almost every debate, and to come to this place and to be able to speak at length was a great luxury.

Sir Anthony Meyer: I am listening with immense interest to the hon. Lady's remarks. Does she agree with me that one of the sad features about the Labour party, which I criticise in many respects, is that it is no longer dedicated to the internationalist ideals which used to command universal respect? Nothing is sadder than to find that the hon. Lady is a relatively isolated voice among those on the Labour Benches.

Mrs. Clwyd: People in glasshouses should not throw stones. The speeches that I have heard this evening from Conservative Members do not give me cause for any enthusiasm. Some of the opinions that they have expressed have not coincided with mine. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should do some missionary work among his right hon. and hon. Friends before starting on mine.

I do not know why Members of this place are still so sensitive. Is it because we are conscious of the fact that we are criticised by many for comprising one of the most ineffective legislatures in western Europe? Is it thought that the European Parliament might become more effective than the Westminster Parliament? I believe that in 20 years the European Parliament will be more important than the House of Commons.

I agree with the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that our national goals can be achieved only in co-operation with others. I believe strongly that we must co-operate with people from other countries. We talk about controlling multinational companies, but how can one country on its own control the strength of the multinationals? It is only by co-operating with other countries that we can exercise that control. The Council of Ministers missed a good opportunity to exercise that control when it voted down the proposals that were advanced by the Parliament and the Committee of which I was a member for five years. Had that legislation been voted through it would have meant that workers in multinational companies could have had much more information about the way their companies operated.

So it is conceivable that some of the aims which we support can be achieved. In many areas of foreign policy, for example, I found that the European Community was much more sensible in its approach than I have found the House of Commons to be in the two years that I have been here.

Earlier this year, the states of the Community raised the level of their subscriptions to the club. What I have said already does not mean that I am uncritical of the European Community. Indeed, I am extremely critical. It has been a goal of the European Community for some time to control agricultural spending, but somehow, because of the actions of the Council of Ministers, I believe, that goal has not been achieved. As regards the budget compromise, which has been much praised by Government Members, some four weeks after the subscriptions were raised we got an inkling that there was not enough to pay for the rapidly rising costs of the organisation.

If the bleak picture drawn by the budget Commissioner in Brussels recently is correct, spending cuts are obviously on the way. These will have to come from the social and regional funds, youth training, job creation or industrial research programmes. We benefit greatly from the social and regional funds of the European Community and it is a great pity that those funds are such a small percentage of the total budget spending of the Community. If we could control agricultural spending, obviously this country in particular would benefit.

The figures also show that the much-hailed system of budgetary discipline agreed by EEC Finance Ministers in 1984 to control the growth of agricultural spending and keep it below the overall growth in EEC revenue is all too easy to breach. The idea is constantly bandied about that the EEC and its institutions are hopelessly spendthrift, restrained only by the valiant efforts of the Secretary of State and his colleagues. But the Community is made up of 12 member states and its budget is directly the result of their decisions. The Commission is only the bureaucracy which tries to put the policies into effect, and occasionally suggests policies.

The European Parliament as it is at present is only a sop to democratic control. It can add only a small amount of extra spending at the margins. It cannot do anything about the vast bulk of the budget, and above all agricultural spending. The budget crisis which is likely to land on us yet again is, I suggest, the result of years of fudged compromises in the Council of Ministers and of a failure to co-ordinate the policies of the different national Departments involved.

The Financial Times, in a very good article on "The crisis that never went away" a few weeks ago, said:

"The Council perpetuates the legal myth that it is somehow united and indivisible. In reality, it is a machine of ill-fitting cogs often working in competition rather than co-ordination. The unhappy consequence is the annual budget, invariably negotiated through the night by junior treasury Ministers who have been known to make wild and foolish compromises in the early hours in the faint hope of getting to bed."

Mr. Rippon: As they do here.

Mrs. Clwyd: I would suggest that that is not true of the European Parliament, the Members of which work together on a day-to-day basis over a long period. I believe that the objective of compromise and of reaching some sort of sensible control of agricultural spending is much more likely to be achieved in the European Parliament than in the Council of Ministers.

In other ways too, Britain is being proved a nation of idiots, and male chauvinist idiots at that, with humiliating regularity in the European Court of Justice. The latest instance, of course, was the judgment of the court in favour of plain common sense — more evident there, apparently, than in the corridors of power here. The judges agreed that forcing a woman to retire at 60 or 62, against her will, from a job in which a man would be allowed to stay until he was 65 is discriminatory and against EEC rules.

That was only one of a string of judgments which show that, however liberal and far-sighted the equal pay legislation and the Sex Discrimination Act were when they were introduced more than a decade ago, it is now time to look at the legislation again. The legislation at present going through the House of Lords is not going to achieve this aim. The alternative is to face continuing ridicule in the European Court of Justice, because Britain has appeared before it on sex discrimination issues more times than any other EEC country.

Last year the EEC initiated a programme to promote equal opportunities for women, noting that, despite past efforts at Community and national levels, inequalities in employment still existed in practice and might well be exacerbated in the present crisis conditions.

I want to take up briefly the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) about the EEC directive on parental and family leave. For me one of the worst times in the two years that I have been in the House was the evening when we discussed that directive on the Floor of the House, and the way in which the spokesperson on this matter was ridiculed by some Government Members. The subject of equal rights was discussed many times in the European Parliament and I never heard the kind of remarks that came from the Government Benches on what is a very serious subject on which progressive legislation was being proposed. That says something for the European Parliament as compared with the House of Commons—but then, of course, there were more women in the European Parliament and it would have been more difficult to ridicule women there than it is, apparently, to ridicule women in this House who make sensible contributions to debates.

I therefore urge the Minister to look again at this matter; I am sure that she will be sympathetic. I have had many letters asking the Government to look again at the proposals for parental and family leave. Parental leave is time off work for either parent following the end of maternity leave to care for a child under the age of two. That leave is becoming increasingly available in other EEC countries. From January 1986, nine EEC countries will have some form of parental leave. In two member states, West Germany and Belgium, parental leave and sabbaticals have been established not only to strengthen family life but as a way of reducing unemployment—something which I thought might be rather attractive to this Government—parents on leave being replaced by unemployed workers. It is estimated that in West Germany, when parental leave comes into effect fully during this year, one-year contracts may be given to 200,000 people currently unemployed.

I urge the Government to look again, so that we do not again look ridiculous among our EEC partners, at the subject of parental leave. This is a progressive reform, as have been many of the reforms in the European Parliament over the years — on equal rights, on environmental issues and on other social and employment issues — which have helped workers throughout the EEC.

I support the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) who was on the Select Committee on European Legislation. I had hoped that that Committee would properly scrutinise EEC legislation, but it does nothing of the sort. It simply rubber-stamps a succession of documents without any proper discussion on the merits of the proposals. It is left to the other place properly to scrutinise EEC legislation. When I was a Member of the European Parliament I was grateful for the excellent reports produced by noble Lords in the other place. I hope that our own Select Committee can become more relevant. If we believe in the proper scrutiny of EEC legislation and want to influence that legislation, we should have proper discussions about it in our Select Committees. We are abdicating our responsibilities if we do not take up that challenge.

Mr. George Gardiner (Reigate): I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) with great interest. I disagree with many of the things that she said, and I certainly disagree with her eager anticipation of the future powers of the European Parliament. I also differ from her in her assessment of the relative importance of the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers. However, her ready understanding of the need for much closer co-operation in Europe and her recognition that this must involve some compromise on all sides came as a breath of fresh air from the Opposition Benches and certainly sets the hon. Lady apart from the contributions made by some of her hon. Friends.

I shall not follow the hon. Lady further than that, because I should like to speak about one aspect of the Bill —the proposed limited extension of qualified majority voting that will enable the Community to meet the 1992 target date for completion of the internal market.

In our discussions on Community matters we speak on several levels. We sometimes speak of ideals, and we also discuss practicalities. I have great respect for those who regularly expound the ideals, but it is perhaps more useful for us to concentrate on the practicalities. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) tries hon. Members with his humour about their being Euro-fanatics. I join in the fun, but I hope that I am not counted among them. It is our duty not to indulge in great flights of oratory in favour of pie in some European sky. We should approach matters in a pragmatic British way.

We all acknowledge that in some spheres our membership of the Community works against us. It is commonplace for us to attack the size, importance and operation of the common agricultural policy, the foundations for which were laid long before we became

[Mr. George Gardiner]

Community members. By and large, the CAP has not worked in our favour, although one notes the efforts now being made by our Government and others to bring its spending and its budget under control. It is still a colossus built on principles and priorities that were established in the Community before we joined.

If we are to take a pragmatic approach, surely we should be throwing all our energy and our arguments into developing those aspects of the European Community that will work significantly to our advantage—if they are allowed to develop. In that respect we come once again to what is often commonplace in our discussions, the desirability of creating a genuine common market of the kind that so many of our people thought we were joining, a full internal market. That is why we have the programme upon which members have embarked to scrap all non-tariff barriers before 1992. The achievement of that target is essential for our industrial and commercial survival, and it is just as essential for the other members of the Community.

It is interesting to note when comparing the home markets in the world how the home market that we have created in the Community is vastly greater than that enjoyed by Japan. It is larger even than that of the United States of America, yet in a great many of our economic activities we persist in behaving as if the Community consisted of 12 related but separate markets. As I have said before, the result of this is that the industry and commerce of western Europe cannot achieve the economies of scale that a large home market can offer and so have to sell overseas and at home against American and Japanese competitors whose own home markets confer upon them precisely that advantage. The United States and Japan exploit to the full their smaller home markets. If it wants to, Europe could do the same, but we are still fragmented and until we put this great disadvantage behind us we will never achieve anything like our potential.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) spoke about high technology industry in Europe. Surely that industry offers the most classic case of that which I am describing. Each Government lean over backwards to place orders in a way that will boost or protect their own national, favourite industries. That applies especially to telephone and telecommunications equipment. Every Government in Europe do that and it has been estimated that the total cost to our European Governments is £24 million or more each year. When we do that, we deny our high technology industries the opportunities that would be offered in much greater cross-frontier co-operation, and as we shrink from that we lose the battle in competition abroad. It is noteworthy that in information technology the European industries supply only 10 per cent. of the world market and only 40 per cent. of our own home market. What an example of lost opportunity.

It has also become commonplace for us to argue in favour of the full internal market to create the opportunities which our insurance and other commercial institutions seek in Europe, and which I am sure they could exploit to our advantage. They cannot do so until a full and effective internal market has been developed. We have heard about the exasperation caused by frontier delays, that personal form of non-tariff barrier that operates every day of every week of every month of the year. It has been calculated that the delays in crossing frontiers cost trade and industry in Europe about £7 billion each year.

I should like to cite a rather human example, which moved me, of the experience of a British engineer who was bound for his company's annual conference. The company had sales representatives throughout Europe, and the conference had been booked at Vittel in France—which is, I am told, a rather sleepy spa town. About 90 engineers were due to converge on Vittel from all over western Europe. As is usual at such conferences, there was a theme which was repeated on folders, pens, stationery generally and on tee-shirts. I shall call our friend Henry; he certainly exists, but not under that name. He loaded his car with a selection of all those goods and boarded the hovercraft for Calais.

Once in Calais, Henry joined the queue of cars at the customs barrier. He was waved down and asked a few questions. All was going quite swimmingly until the customs officer spotted the box of tee-shirts in the rear of his car. Then the problems started.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): A box of what?

Mr. Gardiner: Tee-shirts. I thought that I was speaking clearly. The hon. Gentleman either was not listening or needs some attention to his hearing.

All was going well for our friend Henry until the customs officer in Calais spotted that box. Then the trouble started. Henry was told that it was quite illegal for him to import those tee-shirts into France without some documentation. He was told that he would have to return to England to get the proper papers. Henry expostulated: could he not dump the tee-shirts there, as the conference could get on without them? He was told that he was not allowed to do that either, and that he must go back to get the proper documentation.

So Henry boarded the hovercraft again for Dover leaving his car in Calais. On the hovercraft he was informed that he needed T2 forms to validate that importation. Of course, as soon as he arrived at Dover a customs officer said, "Excuse me, Sir, but you realise that you must pay if you want to import those goods into Britain." However, our Henry took that as a joke, and he was told how to obtain his T2 forms.

Henry then had to appoint a shipping agent. Ten minutes later an agent was produced who did the necessary paperwork for the quite modest fee of £18. Henry then proceeded again to customs. But he was stopped and told, "Sorry mate. You're freight. You must join the queue over there." The queue over there was a queue of juggernauts. So Henry lifted up his box of tee-shirts and went to join the queue of juggernauts. There another customs officer looked at him and shook his head again; "I am afraid your papers are not in order. You're freight but you're travelling on a passenger ticket. Your ticket does not declare you on the ship's manifest." The ship's manifest is the list of all the freight on the ship or hovercraft. Henry was told that he would have to go back and change his ticket.

So Henry went back and coughed up another £26 to get the necessary ticket. He then cleared customs, but while he had been waiting in the juggernaut queue it had been announced that his hovercraft was leaving early, so he had missed it. Being rather philosophical by this time, he said, "All right, I'll have to catch the next one." But someone else said, "Sorry sir. All your papers are for the last crossing. They're all wrong for the next one." As one might expect, Henry exploded and a good British compromise was reached. He was allowed to board the hovercraft again for Calais even though he was apparently travelling with his goods illegally.

Henry arrived there brandishing all his forms in triplicate or quadruplicate, but found that there was no customs officer to present them to. However, having gone through all that, he was going to make sure that his papers were duly stamped. So someone was woken up and his papers were stamped. He was told that he would have to pay duty the following Monday at Epinal, which was the nearest tax point to Vittel, where the conference was being held. Henry then handed the whole exercise over to a secretary engaged in organising the conference. Come Monday, she contacted the tax point at Epinal to be told that she could not undertake the transaction herself but would have to appoint a French shipping agent. A French shipping agent was duly found who did the necessary work. It cost £180 including tax and the fee.

That is the situation that one admittedly ignorant citizen encountered after we have been in the Common Market for 10 years, just because he tried to perform the quite innocent task of taking 100 tee-shirts to a conference held in a French spa town. The tee-shirts, which were worth £300, ended up costing £526 and involving an unbelievable hassle. That is a microcosm of what traders and exporters experience every day at frontiers. It may be objected that the regulars know the ropes. Of course they do, but hon. Members should contemplate the cost in time and money to them of meeting the required rules.

Thus, most of us agree about the end, but the question is how do we achieve it. The barrier is the ease with which an agreement to scrap internal barriers can be blocked, usually in response to some entrenched and often fairly narrow national interest. I differ from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley because I believe that, if the situation is to be rectified, the driving force for reform must come from within the Council of Ministers. It cannot come from the European Parliament. We need a qualified majority voting system to get round that blockage.

If we want a genuine common market and a full internal market, we must will the means to that end. If we deny the means by denying the mechanism for achieving that end, we have no moral or political right to castigate the Community for its preoccupation with agriculture or for failing its citizens in those areas in which it could achieve so much for us. We know what we want; let us give ourselves the tools to get it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I welcome a small announcement that seemed to be spatchcocked into the Foreign Secretary's speech. It concerned the secretariat that is to be set up to promote continuity between Community presidencies. Those of us who have had the good fortune to have been members of the indirectly elected European Parliament must be worried about the peripatetic nature of European institutions. Consequently, anything that operates to ease the transition between one presidency and another is to be welcomed.

The announcement may have been small but it was significant. By its very nature, this group of people will be extremely powerful. Of course, incoming Ministers and their officials will be dependent on those who have the power that is derived from continuity. The permanent people in the permanent secretariat will be at a great advantage compared with those who come for six months in the expectation of leaving. But how will the secretariat be accountable? I should welcome an answer to that point at the end of the debate.

Secondly, I interrupted the Foreign Secretary earlier on the question of research, and European cancer research. On 18 December 1985, the Foreign Secretary said:

> "Following discussion at the European Council it was agreed to set up a committee of scientific experts to recommend co-ordinated action to combat cancer." — [Official Report, 18 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 299.]

I asked him on that occasion whether he would reflect on the concentration of work in centres of excellence, not only in Britain, but the universities of Edinburgh and Cambridge, in the Max Planck institute, the university of Leyden and elsewhere. I refer specifically to the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, since she gave me an answer on 15 January 1986 on the question of progress of cancer research that said:

> "Yes. The Committee of EC cancer experts set up following the December Foreign Affairs Council will meet for the first time on 24 January in Brussels. Its task is to make recommendations for a co-ordinated plan of action to combat cancer in EC member states. The United Kingdom's representative will be Professor Norman Bleehen, honorary director, Medical Research Council unit of clinical oncology and radiotherapeutics."

I see that we have the Minister for Health answering this debate. It is particularly apt that I should then quote that reputable correspondent, Thomson Prentice, the science correspondent for The Times, who wrote in his paper of 18 February:

> "Professor Derek Crowther, the cancer research campaign's professor of medical oncology at the Christie Hospital, Manchester University, and a member of the organisation's board, said yesterday 'I am concerned that the funding that we need will not be forthcoming from the EEC.'"

So, hopes having been raised of meaningful inter-European research on cancer, what is now happening? Or is this just one of those good ideas that gathers dust in the pigeonholes?

Few research projects could be of more concern to Europe than the proposals on the strategic defence initiative. This is neither the time nor the occasion to go into the case of Mr. Clarence Robinson, of which more anon, but today I asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Department has had with the authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany about the terms of the agreement entered into by both countries with the United States of America for strategic defence initiative work. The reply was:

> "There have been some exchanges but none of detail with officials of the FRG about the respective agreements between the Government of that country and HMG with the United States Government for SDI research."

This is deeply unsatisfactory. In this of all projects there really should be some kind of co-ordinated European reaction. In the light of the leaked memorandum of understanding from Bonn, would it not have been sensible that we should have had an understanding in this country with our European partners on some kind of coherent reaction to the American SDI proposition?

I would have thought that there were more Foreign Office Ministers. Why the Minister for Health has to be dragged in to answer a foreign affairs debate I do not know, but I do not complain about these things as he is a senior Minister. I refer to the Foreign Secretary's speech. He talked in terms of treaty provisions relating to foreign policy, how the agreements and practices of 15 years had worked well, of severe practical tests and the need for Europe to speak with one voice. The House, he said, should not be dismissive of such things.

If ever there was an occasion when Europe should have been speaking with one voice it was surely in the present Libyan crisis. The Foreign Secretary said that it was not possible to mobilise opinion on Libya unless we were in the habit of working together. They do not seem to work very well together, and I ask specifically did we, or our European partners, do anything to discourage the United States from taking the action against Libya? If not, why not? Surely it was the duty of the Europeans at least to warn the United States if they felt like this. Did they do so?

Earlier this afternoon the Foreign Secretary, when replying to my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), talked about separate considerations and separate circumstances which had made it difficult on 14 April to discuss the possible American attack on Libya. If these people were in the habit of working together, as he claims, why did they not discuss it? After all, it is not as if the French and others were ignorant of the problem, because their Governments had had requests for the use of airspace. Surely the very fact that they were asked about the use of airspace reveals that they were in the know about the intentions.

Why was it not discussed? Was any inkling given of the British state of knowledge to our European partners? I ask this because, as my hon. Friend from Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) will know, his constituency neighbour, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the Secretary of State for Defence, made a speech on Scottish radio giving all the reasons why we should not launch an attack on Libya. Was there a difference in the state of knowledge between the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary? How could the Defence Secretary make that kind of speech if in the previous week he had been brought into the know about, at any rate the possibility, more likely, probability, or certainty, of an American attack?

There is something to be settled here between the Defence Secretary and the Foreign Secretary. The act of refusal of the airspace reveals that the Foreign Secretary——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman can discuss the principle of working together, but he knows he is straying from the Second Reading.

Mr. Foulkes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As well as discussing the Second Reading, we are also discussing developments in the European Community, July to December, 1985, and I would submit that my hon. Friend's remarks are within the context of that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am listening very carefully. We are discussing the principle of working together and developments within the Community. Fair enough. But we must not go over again some of the incidents that the hon. Gentleman is referring to.

Mr. Dalyell: I ask how it is that Italian sources have now made it clear that the F111s which rendezvoused over the sixth fleet peeled off not only to Tripoli but to Benghazi. One source of information is the chief defence correspondent of the Corriere Della Sera. If European co-operation at Foreign Secretary level says that this is wrong, I would like an outright denial tonight in the wind-up. Last night, hurriedly, 10 Downing street issued a denial that there were F111s over Benghazi. The truth is that from their transponders the Italians did track——

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Dalyell: It is always said that it is disgraceful when Downing street is caught again concealing the truth or misleading the House.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that there are those engaged in this debate who would like to talk about the Bill before the House, and would he accept that this is nothing more or less than a publicity exercise, a "super-Belgrano", on his part?

Mr. Dalyell: I will not be too long.

I admit that cluster bombs found in Benghazi had navy markings, but I ask the very direct question of the Minister who is to reply: were there F111s over Benghazi? Are the Italian sources wrong? I do not think they are, and if they are not wrong, why was Downing street going to such pains to issue that statement last night? Is it that they simply do not know what is happening?

I ask for clarification of the Official Report of 16 April, column 950. The Foreign Secretary said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East:

"There was scarcely any mention of the United States intention."

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that you have just ruled on the hon. Gentleman's speech? It is getting very tedious for those of us who have to listen to it to hear these revelations about something that has nothing to do with the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Whether hon. Members are in order is a matter for the Chair. I am listening carefully. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) must relate his remarks to the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: As my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley pointed out, we are discussing also page 29 of the White Paper on Developments in the European Community where there is a heading, "EC/United States". I think I am in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been listening carefully and the hon. Gentleman's last remark did not seem to relate even to that.

Mr. Dalyell: The Foreign Secretary continued:

"No evidence emerged during the discussion that any Foreign Minister was aware during the meeting of a final American decision to attack. For my part, I had no confirmation of any decision by the President, still less of any decision to authorise raids that night, until I came back to London and met the Prime Minister."—[Official Report, 16 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 950.]

What exactly is meant by confirmation? Does that mean that the Foreign Secretary had no inkling?

If we are to have the European co-operation which the Foreign Secretary thinks is so important, there must be at least some candour between partners. I believe it to be both hypocritical and unwise to try to justify the action on the ground of article 51 of the United Nations charter; it is hypocritical because the article was never intended to cover anything like that, and it was unwise because it opens the door to its abuse. To extend it to justify armed action——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has quoted page 29 of the White Paper. There is nothing there about armed action. He must relate what he is saying to the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: We are discussing also the relations between the EC and the United States, but I shall be brief. Beyond one's own frontiers it could have very undesirable repercussions. For example, it could be used by Libya to justify a reprisal——

Mr. Cash: Boring old twat.

Mr. Dalyell —for something that happened to a Libyan in this country.

Did I hear the hon. Gentleman aright, saying that that was rubbish?

Mr. Cash: I was saying that it was extremely boring.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: He said "Twat."

Mr. Dalyell: The twat in this case is the Field Marshal Lord Carver. I was quoting exactly——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) must withdraw those remarks. They are unparliamentary.

Mr. Cash: I withdraw the remark, but it was said under provocation of an extreme kind.

Mr. Dalyell: We want to know who was consulted and at what stage——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is talking about particular actions and who was consulted. That is not related to the debate. He must come to the subject of the debate or I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Dalyell: One of the troubles about the House of Commons is that generalities are all right, even if they are waffle, but when one asks specific questions of fact, things are more difficult. I am interested in fact because it is fact that illuminates the dreadful things that have happened.

There is one other matter that the Community should consider—an agreement on the vexed question of end user certificates. To have the countries of Europe competing in exporting sophisticated armaments without asking questions about where those armaments end up is highly dangerous. More and more of us are concerned about terrorism. We know that arms are exported from the countries of the Community to other countries and that a blind eye is turned to those arms finding their way into terrorists' hands. Is there not something to be said for countries getting together to consider the whole question of how sophisticated armaments can easily end up in terrorists' hands? Could not the European countries get together to produce meaningful legislation about end user certificates? It is such European co-operation that some of us believe in.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I think that most of us agree that in many respects this is an unsatisfactory debate. The Government are gaining a day by taking the six-monthly Community report with the Bill, although the six-monthly report makes only a tiny reference to the Bill.

We have heard again a pile of generalisations that if only we pass the Bill things will be better, although there is no indication of why or how. Rather than having the Bill and the treaty, how much better it would be for all of us and the country if we were simply to concentrate on trying to persuade the Common Market to solve, with the powers that it already has, some of the problems which have existed for years and years and which have been getting worse.

Hon. Members will know that when we joined the EEC we were advised that it would bring us more jobs, more prosperity and better trade. I am not saying that it is necessarily cause and effect, but since we joined trade has been disastrous, so that instead of the constant surplus which we always had previously we now have a deficit of £9 billion in manufactures. With regard to employment, there is hardly an area of the world, apart from the Common Market, and possibly Tibet and El Salvador, which do not publish figures, with a worse record in job creation.

Apart from that, Common Market spending has got out of control. Of every penny that it spends, 54 per cent. goes not on agriculture but on the dumping of food in outside countries, mainly Russia, east Europe and Libya. Plenty of things are wrong. They need to be solved, and they could be solved with existing powers. That is the view, not just of a Back-Bench militant, but of the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the whole Government until a few months ago.

That view was repeated time after time by the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary when we asked them about it. We had the Milan summit. Immediately after it the Prime Minister said:

> "I saw nothing before us which would require an amendment to the treaty."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 189.]

Later my right hon. Friend made it abundantly clear, as did the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, that far from being necessary a new treaty would hold Europe back from solving its problems, would divert it, would take up its time and would not solve anything at all. Therefore, the Bill is unnecessary and irrelevant, and will simply divert Europe from tackling its problems. That is not the only point. We should be trying to persuade Europe to apply properly the powers that it has.

The Foreign Secretary made a rather ungracious speech. I think that that was because his heart was not in it. He is such a nice person that we can usually tell when his heart is not in a subject. He was giving us assurances. On a previous occasion when he wanted us to pass something else which he did not like, namely, the agreement of 4 December 1984 which led to increased contributions to the Community and all the rest of it, we were given specific assurances. We were told, "You need not worry. We will have regular reports month by month to make sure that there is not any spending."

That was not just a decision of the Government, but a provision in the agreement. Under paragraph 6*(b)* the Commission had to submit a monthly report to the Council of Ministers about trends in agricultural spending. On 11 March I asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many such reports had been made. The answer sadly was, none. Yet it was a provision of the agreement that a monthly report be made. The answer to my question was:

"The Commission has not recently produced a formal monthly report to the Council".

The EC Commission was also obliged, under paragraph 6(b), to give a report on early warning procedures of possible budget overruns. I asked the Minister whether the Commission had done so. The answer was:

"The Commission has not specifically reported under this procedure".—[Official Report, 11 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 436.]

If the Government are saying that we must pass the Bill because assurances have been given, I ask them to start trying to ensure that the Common Market actually applies some of the legislative provisions that exist now.

There is also the rather astonishing decision of the Commission—this makes me think that the Government should be chasing the existing powers—to take power unto itself to sell dairy products to anyone at any price and not to publish the figures. Despite our disagreements with them from time to time, Agriculture Ministers are very good in telling us the whole truth. When I asked whether the Commission had the power to which I have referred, the answer was:

"The Commission considers that it already has the authority to act in this way, so no proposal was put to the Council."—[Official Report, 8 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 37.]

Many things need to be done, and the Bill will not do any of them, but will simply be a diversion. My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardner), in his fascinating speech, talked about the problem of people taking tee-shirts to Paris. He did not say that every problem could be solved within the existing rules if there was the will or if the European Court worked. The only problem that could not be solved was the difference in VAT, which led to the tax liability.

We also have the problem, which we constantly put to the Government, of the abuse of some of the trade laws, a good example of which is the abuse of the inner German trade agreement. Hon. Members on both sides have been pestering the Government with complaints about the abuse of the inner German trade agreement. There is the strange situation that 40 per cent. of all Britain's imports of powdered eggs come from Germany, although Germany is not self-sufficient in the manufacture of eggs. This is simply because piles of materials come from eastern Europe and get into the Common Market through the abuse of the inner German trade agreement. This problem must be solved, but nothing is being done about it; no one is taking any action. Yet what the Government want are more legislative provisions.

There is a decided lack of will by any Government to do anything about the absurd problem of the CAP. They all say that something should be done, but no meaningful or sensible policy is put forward by anyone. This problem could be solved, yet in this case the Bill makes not the slightest difference. What we need, instead of more power for the Common Market, the European Assembly and the Commission, is to get them to try to solve some of the problems which exist now and which are certainly not being solved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate also referred to the problem of telecommunications. He said how much better it would be if we in Europe could stop discriminating on a national basis and buy home goods to establish the basic market that we need to export abroad. He knows that it is unlawful to discriminate in public purchasing against the products of Germany, France, Italy, Luxembourg or any part of the Community. That is the law now; we do not need new provisions. The law that exists needs to be implemented if we think it is sensible.

We can look back to when we were told that if only we joined the EEC lots of good things would happen. It is rather like a doctor giving one pills to make one's tummy better. If one's tummy gets worse, the answer is not to take more pills. However, in this case we are being asked to give more powers to the European Assembly—which is now to called the Parliament — and to the Common Market to do things. As well as the disappearance from some areas of the unanimity rule, the Common Market is taking on new activities, ideas, spending and bureaucracy. How will it help this nation, or help the Common Market to solve its problems, if we simply give more power and responsibility and, I believe, create more complexity in the way that it operates?

The Bill gives more confidence to the Common Market to take action and to spend money. Do we really think that by putting more public funds into the activity of the Common Market it will solve the problems? The Bill will give a new name to the European Assembly — a marginal provision. Some people would regard that as a point of principle, but I think that it is rather silly. The Bill provides for a new European Court because the existing court has become overloaded. I understand that the number of cases considered by the court has tripled over the past few years.

The Bill provides for a new commitment to European union. As I have said, the Foreign Secretary was a little nasty in his speech today because, I believe, his heart was not in the task, so perhaps it would not be unkind to remind him that when he was asked, at the time of the announcement of this treaty, whether it referred to a commitment to European union he said that I was misleading the House as there was no question of European union being mentioned. However, in the Bill there is a clear commitment to European union and, most important, a commitment for the first time to provide the means to achieve the union.

In addition, the European Assembly is being given the power to stop certain action. The powers are complicated, but the provisions simply mean that, if the European Assembly, by a clear majority, does not like what the Council is doing, the Council can overturn the rejection only by a unanimous vote. In those circumstances, obtaining a unanimous vote will be difficult, particularly in view of the attitude that Italy has to the views of the European Parliament. So in this case a major new blocking power is provided.

Then there is the removal of the provision for unanimity or veto on a number of issues. This is not a new principle, because of the provision in several areas already for majority voting. The Bill extends this provision into other areas, particularly harmonisation measures. It has been suggested that this will make completion of the market easier, but I doubt whether it will do anything in that direction.

The Minister should give an assurance to those who are worried about this extension. For example, will the new television directive limit on the number of non-EEC programmes shown in this country and in others fall under the majority voting procedure? My understanding from those who know about it is that it will do so, but it would help to know for certain whether that is the case. Will the provision mean that the Government will be committed to support the harmonisation of taxes? We know that such a provision will need unanimity, but if this is what is intended, are we willing politically to face the desirability of introducing VAT on gas, electricity and so on?

I suggest that the Bill will not improve the working of the Common Market. It will add a little more confusion by giving more power to the European Assembly, and we do not need that. What we need to do is to persuade the Government to use all their resources to try to persuade the Common Market to solve the problems that it has, without giving it new responsibilities.

I hope that hon. Members considering the Bill will bear in mind that £75 million is a lot of money. With that sum we could build many schools, hospitals and roads. Yet £75 million is what the Common Market spends every week simply on export rebates for dumping food. It is an outrage that we are spending so much on dumping cheap food in the Soviet Union and Libya. Those who care about the Third world should think about what this dumping is doing to the poorest countries in the world. It is depriving them of a decent price for their produce and spreading devastation, destruction, distress and debt.

I hope the House will reject all the silly nonsense in the Bill. I hope that it will get rid of it, as the Government wanted to do before they were persuaded by the views of the other partners to adopt it. We know that the Government think that this is a wretched piece of legislation and that they never wanted it. The Government should stand by that position, throw out this silly Bill, and make it abundantly clear that as from now we expect the Common Market to try to solve some of the many problems which remain unsolved and which in some cases are getting worse.

8.9 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I will for the most part direct my remarks to the document ,"Developments in the European Community". If there is time, on international matters, I would like to refer specifically to pages 32, 29 and 9. I am encouraged to do so by paragraph 2.11 on page 9 which states:

"The new treaty on European Co-operation in the sphere of Foreign Policy, based on the British text tabled earlier in 1985, formalises and strengthens the commitment to consult and concert. It applies to the existing pattern of consultation on the economical and political — but not the defence — aspects of security".

I hope that what I have to say will be considered relevant to the debate.

I welcome the presence of the Minister on the Front Bench. However, I would not have complained if the Minister for Health were still present, because I had intended to refer to the section of the document which refers to the anti-poverty programme. I had hoped that the Department of Health and Social Security would pay due regard not just to the views of many people on the document—important though it is—but to the response to some of the remarks of the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) who seemed to pour cold water on the influence of the European courts and the role that they play.

I could not disagree more strongly with the right hon. Gentleman. The European courts offer, if perhaps not more experience, certainly fresh attitudes to many matters. They are not bogged down by commitments to the establishment, and they can bear in mind the demands of the modern world. It is perhaps unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman said what he did after the expression of opinion by the Lord Advocate to the European Court of Justice in the case of Mrs. Drake. I wish that the Minister for Health had been here at that point in the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I believe not only that the views expressed in that case on the invalidity care allowance are profoundly progressive and humane, but that it would be outrageous if the Government did not accept those findings. I am sure that many hon. Members will join me in deploring the rumours circulating today not only that the Government will set the opinion aside but that they might discontinue the allowance in all its aspects. I do not believe that the House would be prepared to accept that.

The document made at least three references to the steel industry. If I understood the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) correctly, he described the EEC as an economic giant. His speech was in many ways a courageous one and I hope that I am not taking that remark out of context. However, it would be difficult to persuade those in the west central belt of Scotland that the Community represented an economic giant in terms of the real world, especially in view of the heavy and growing burden of unemployment—especially long-term unemployment — that we bear in that part of the United Kingdom.

The report refers to the problems of protectionism. I shall not want to sound anti-American, especially when I discuss international matters, but the report shows that in 33 categories the Americans are applying protectionism. I am not sure that that is consistent with the policies that the Community, in co-operation with the United States, would wish to see pursued.

There are practical effects for my own constituents in the steel industry. We have had more than our fair share of job reductions in that industry. For every three jobs in the United Kingdom in 1979, there is only one today. I am sure that the same applies to many other industries—for instance, shipbuilding. Last week I was in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I was reminded that my hon. Friend's constituency has lost 4,000 jobs in shipbuilding alone since 1982. Such a situation does not seem to show the influence of the policies of an economic giant.

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend's natural courtesy ensured that I knew of his proposed visit to my constituency far in advance.

The decline continues. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that I was unable to be in the Chamber to hear the opening speeches in this debate because I was seeking meetings with Ministers in both the Scottish Office and the Ministry of Defence for the trade union representatives of another shipyard in my constituency which has no orders whatsoever and faces closure.

Mr. Clarke: I know that my hon. Friend's constituents are fully aware of the excellent job that he does in stating their case and are very appreciative of his work.

I deplore the decline in our manufacturing base and the de-industrialisation which, alas, is taking place throughout the Community and especially in my part of the world. I am also concerned about the environmental issues raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon). On Monday, I drew to the attention of the Minister for Overseas Development the document "Mandate for Change" published by the World Commission on Environment and Development. The Minister said that he regarded the document as an interim one. He gave the impression that he was not responding wholeheartedly to the concern expressed in that document for the environment not only in the United Kingdom and the developed countries but also in the Third world, where the environment is just as important to those who live there as our environment is to us.

The document "Mandate for Change" made it clear that there is evidence that has led 20 other countries to act in the interests of the environment. We should bear that in mind when we are dealing with funding for overseas aid and overseas investment and development. I have no wish at all to encourage a reduction in our contribution, but I believe we should try to improve the quality of that contribution, and I believe that bearing the environment in mind will help us to achieve that objective.

I wish briefly to mention the international aspect. The document suggests that the Community is now more concerned with the problems of the developing world than was the case until perhaps a year or two ago. That is very laudable. I believe that the Lomé convention meeting held in Inverness not long ago made an important contribution to the consideration of such matters and also to the acceptance of the role of women in the underdeveloped world. In passing, I believe that the House was delighted with the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). Her experience in those matters was self-evident, and helpful to both the House and the Community.

We must be concerned about the future of our planet, the future of the Third world and the growing problems of armaments at a time of great international poverty and friction. We should therefore give some thought to the paragraph in the document that deals with our relationship with the United States and with East-West relations.

I think that it is fair to say that the Community, on the evidence of this document and on many other actions in which it has been involved, now has a more progressive view on such matters as the Iran-Iraq war, South Africa and East-West relations in addition to the growing problem of central America.

Some hon. Members suggested earlier that anti-Americanism is evident on the Opposition Benches. That represents a considerable misunderstanding of the genuine problems which we feel are being faced in terms of our relationship with the United States. It is not anti-American to take the view that I take. It certainly is not true today that America has the leadership it deserves. That is not always the case, despite the fact that it might be stated often.

I do not think that America deserves its present leadership. I believe that circumstances have changed very dramatically since President Reagan took office, not just for the standing of the American presidency but for the American role in the world. I do not think that any of us should assume for one second that the kind of policies and philosophy that he endorses represent anything more than a temporary aberration from which I am sure both the United States and our relationship with it will in time recover.

Perhaps the saddest aspect of the present American President's attitude is that, because of the philosophy he pursues and because of his carefully considered and carefully projected rhetoric, he has no solutions to the present problems. The President last night addressed the Heritage Foundation. He presented serious problems, not only in simplistic but in unhelpful terms when trying to find a solution to the problems. Did he think when he talked about the relationship between Daniel Ortega and Colonel Gaddafi that his policies in recent years——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. These are important matters, but the hon. Gentleman must relate his comments to the Bill before the House.

Mr. Clarke: I was attempting to do that, and also to bear in mind the Order Paper, which refers to the document I have been discussing. You will be happy to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I am about to conclude.

The document refers to the problems of relationships between ourselves and other countries, including the United States. The time which was given to this debate, important though it is, was limited in scope and was bound to limit hon. Members on the amount that we feel it is appropriate to contribute. That said, I think that it has been a welcome debate. If it means that the House can address itself to the problems of Europe — Europe itself and Europe in a changing world—in the knowledge, which seems to be universally accepted, that we have a great deal more progress to make in the House and in Europe, I believe that that will be in the interests of our people and very much in the interests of a wider world.

8.23 pm

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): When my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) addressed the House, he stressed the importance that we attach to having an unwritten constitution and the great contribution that that has made to the development of this country. It has enabled us to adapt over the years to changing circumstances. The degree to which the European Community has been able to adapt over the past few years to changing circumstances without needing to change the treaties is remarkable. The original treaties have been stretched in all sorts of directions. Many things have been done that were not originally envisaged. Indeed, the Parliament has been exercising more powers, in many ways, than it was originally granted.

When it is said that the Bill and the Single European Act are not necessary for Britain, we can probably agree with that. We are used to living with an unwritten constitution which is continually evolving out of custom and precedent, but we have to remember that the vast majority of states in the world, certainly the majority in the European Community, are not used to living with an unwritten constitution. They are used to having written constitutions which, if they wish to change, they have to change in writing. I hope that we will agree to pass this legislation and adopt the Single European Act, because of the need to conform to the practices of our partners. That is an entirely honourable thing to do.

In view of the changes that have taken place, the subtle changes that are envisaged in the Single European Act and the proposal to change the name of the Assembly to Parliament are right. When the treaties were established the Assembly was an appointed body. It is now an elected Assembly and it does a good deal more than it originally did. It certainly scrutinises legislation and, although strictly speaking it is not entitled to do so, it has, of late, subtly been proposing legislation.

It is extraordinary that those who hold democracy dear should consider that it is reasonable that under the treaties as they stand only the Commission can propose legislation. It seems to be far more reasonable that an elected European Parliament should be able to propose legislation. The modest change envisaged suggests that the European Parliament will be able to propose amendments to legislation. I cannot see how anybody who holds democracy dear to his heart can object to a proposal of this nature.

I can find only one thing objectionable in the entire Single European Act. This is contained in the preamble to the Act, where it refers to something that is not part of the treaty setting up the European Community. It refers to the "Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms".

This convention has caused us much trouble. It is the convention which the European Court of Human Rights upholds, and it is the convention which tells us, for example, that we cannot have corporal punishment in our schools. I do not believe that a court consisting of a few judges in Europe should be able to dictate to a sovereign Parliament what it can or cannot do in its own country about social matters or sentencing policy. Therefore, I object only to that one element contained in the recital of the Act.

Mr. Foulkes: I think that the hon. Gentleman is getting mixed up. I think that he is talking about the European Court of Human Rights, which is under the jurisdiction of the Council of Europe and is not part of the European Community at all.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is right. Perhaps he was not listening to what I was saying. I referred to the

"Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

This is contained in the fourth paragraph of the preamble to the Single European Act, if the hon. Gentleman would care to refer to it. It says:

"Determined to work together to promote democracy on the basis of the fundamental rights recognised in the constitutions and laws of the Member States, in the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the European Social Charter, notably freedom, equality and social justice."

That is the only element in the Act to which I have any objections.

With regard to the importance of the development of the internal market, I cannot improve on the demonstration of the difficulty involved which was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner). It is important to my constituency that the changes are achieved by 1992. Bournemouth has become a major centre for insurance and financial services. The European headquarters of the Chase Manhattan bank are being constructed in my constituency. To exploit the considerable advantages and expertise that Britain has built up in insurance and in financial services, it is vital that we succeed in completing the internal market.

We must remember that, although Britain is an island and is less affected by what others around us do, our partners in the European Community have direct and abutting land frontiers and are much more directly affected by what goes on in neighbouring states. Although we feel that environmental co-operation is important to us, it is much more important to our continental neighbours.

I support the proposals for the regional fund. The United Kingdom has benefited greatly from the operation of that fund. It is extremely important to develop other aspects such as the regional and social funds, which take away some of the enormous preponderance that has tended to attach to agricultural policy in the European Community. If the Community develops in other directions, this will greatly benefit the citizens of the Community, particularly those in the United Kingdom.

It is vital that Britain co-operates with her European partners in research and development. There is only one way in which we can meet the competition which we are now facing from Japan and the United States of America. That is by co-operating and exploiting the advantages of what is potentially the largest single domestic market in the world. We have begun to do that through the ESPRIT and BRITE programmes. It is vital that we expand those operations.

The events of the past week illustrate more clearly than anything else the need for us to co-operate on foreign policy, the need for us in Europe to be able to speak with one voice, and the enormous influence that we can have on events in other parts of the world if only we are prepared to get together and co-operate. I very much hope that we will increase co-operation. My final hope is that we can join the European monetary system and demonstrate even more clearly our commitment to membership of the Community.

8.35 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): The EEC spends most of its money on the common agricultural policy. The best description of the inanities of this money-eating monster is in last year's July report by the Comptroller and Auditor General. I urge all hon. Members to read it. Since then the position has deteriorated. In 1985-86, public spending in Britain on national grants and subsidies under the CAP increased by £500 million to £2·215 billion, yet, in 1985, farm incomes dropped by £879 million to £1·154 billion. The astonishing fact is that support spending on agriculture exceeds farm income. It would be cheaper to pay farmers to produce nothing.

Public spending averages more than £9,000 for each of the 240,300 farm holdings in the United Kingdom. Each holding receives an average subsidy of £9,000 per annum. Most goes on buying up and storing surplus farm produce for which there is no market. Public spending plans allow for further increases. Is not all that wicked and insane? These costs, together with a high level of guaranteed prices, represent a significant transfer of resources from the consumer and taxpayer to the producer. This has stimulated agriculture at the expense of other sectors of the economy. A uniform price for all producers means that large producers are oversupported and encouraged to maximise production, but that does not help small farmers and poorer farming communities.

Let us consider the remarkable feat that present policy has achieved. The CAP was invented in 1957. The policy has boosted public spending to massive levels. The people who are supposed to benefit from this spending have suffered a severe income drop, and their numbers continue to fall. Huge food mountains continue to grow, and the price of food is much higher than it needs to be. By doing this, we damage the interests of our friends around the world, such as those in New Zealand. Only a madman could have achieved that.

Let the House answer the lunacy of one of the chief activities of the CAP. Expensive energy is used to dry into powder skimmed milk left over from making surplus butter. We subsidise the sale of the skimmed milk powder to other EEC farmers who feed it back to the livestock, after adding the water removed in the earlier costly process. We are financing that. Britain has been paying a disproportionate amount to finance this tomfoolery. We were told that all this would be put right by the Fontainebleau agreement. The agreement was to guarantee Britain its rebate and impose financial discipline on the CAP. Spending on agriculture was to grow more slowly than the growth of budget own resources. The Fontainebleau agreement immediately increased by 40 per cent. the VAT contribution to own resources. The Commission has pointed out that agricultural financial discipline could be breached in "exceptional circumstances" or "aberrant circumstances". We know that the whole of the EEC is an aberration and is exceptional.

This much-lauded financial discipline was breached last year. It will be breached spectacularly this year and will be breached again next year. The Fontainebleau agreement is proving worthless in practice and is breaking down.

The breach of financial discipline has been caused by the fall in prices on the world market, which makes it more expensive to subsidise the dumping of EEC surpluses, and by the change in the value of the dollar. As a result, the EEC keeps coming back for a supplementary budget—for even more money to throw down this black hole. Some of us predicted that that would happen. In previous debates, we said that the only thing to do was to turn off the tap of the money supply that finances this madness. The same is true now. As long as we keep voting to give the Common Market more money, this obscene rake's progress will continue.

In the past four years, EEC intervention stocks have increased 500 per cent. At great expense, they are being added to faster than they are being emptied. The 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling will soon be breached. We should remember that the EEC budget mechanism is fixed only while the current 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling is operational. It could be withdrawn as Fontainebleau collapses.

The Commission now looks upon co-responsibility levies as additional taxes to fund agricultural surpluses rather than alleviating them. They are likely to be passed on to the consumer in even higher prices. At the moment the concept of value for money is wholly alien to the Common Market.

I always thought that the Conservatives regarded the function of prices as being to bring supply and demand into balance. The common agricultural policy needs a several-year programme of reducing prices, announced in advance and consistently maintained. Hardship among farmers should be alleviated by direct income support. That would enable us to have freer trade in food and to open our ports once more to the produce of the world, providing cheaper food for our people. To achieve such a sensible policy we shall need to repatriate agricultural policy once more to the jurisdiction of this House rather than leaving it with the EEC bureaucracy.

This dangerous Bill does the opposite. It takes further powers away from this House and gives them to Continental institutions not elected by us or anybody else, and not removable by us. That is a further unacceptable loss of democratic self-government, yet self-government is our most precious possession.

What would be the good of discussing policies with people at general elections if, when we got back to the House, the powers to implement those policies had been surrendered and given away? When voters complain to us about this we shall have to tell them that we have no powers over these matters and that it is no good coming to us but that they should go to Brussels where such issues are decided.

This wretched Bill lists a whole range of matters that are now to be dealt with by majority voting. Let me give the House a good example of what that will mean. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) asked the Prime Minister about the EEC budget. In her written reply on 26 March this year she said:

> "The proposed increase in non-obligatory expenditure represented a threat to budget discipline".

That is a bad thing. We cannot have a threat to budget discipline. She goes on to say:

> "The United Kingdom accordingly opposed the revised draft Budget, which was adopted by qualified majority."—[Official Report, 26 March 1986; Vol. 94, c.493.]

So it does not matter what we say, however dangerous it is, if we have qualified majorities.

As the Scrutiny Committee has said, the Bill provides for the treaties to be amended so that a whole list of matters may be dealt with in a similar way, a whole list of matters over which this House will surrender control, not only derogating from and damaging this House, but damaging the electorate and damaging democracy. It breaks all the pledges made to the electorate at the time of the referendum. It abrogates the basis of that referendum and of our membership.

I have here the document that was issued by the Government at the time of the referendum. It was printed in red, white and blue. It says at the top of the page:

> "Will Parliament lose its power?"

and goes on:

> "Fact No. 2. No important new policy can be decided in Brussels or anywhere else without the consent of a British Minister answerable to a British Government and British Parliament."

It could not be clearer or more specific, but this Bill flies in the face of that clear pledge to the people. Every issue on which this Bill specifies majority voting is an affront to that pledge and that commitment so solemnly given in the referendum. Such a proposition of majority voting has never been put to the British people, and there is absolutely no popular consent to this unprincipled Bill which double-crosses the electorate.

To pledge in the referendum that a British Minister answerable to this House will always have a veto and then to come along with this Bill to provide for majority voting is a cheat and a swindle and it deceives the voters. This continuous undermining of Parliament, of our democratic self-government and of the rights of the electorate is something to which I shall never be reconciled and will work to rectify.

Symbolic of this whole issue is the proposed change in the name of the European Assembly. "Assembly" is a good name for this unloved institution. It assembles. Apart from doing that and talking, it does little else. It is a talking shop, not a proper Parliament that legislates. However, those who want to turn the Common Market into some sort of monster unitary state want, as a symbolic gesture, to call it a Parliament and to give it extra powers. The key question is, if the EEC Assembly is to get extra powers, where will they come from? Any extra powers for the Assembly will inevitably mean fewer powers for this House and the people who elect us, and we should resist that.

My final point is on employment. When we entered the EEC simple souls suggested that the so-called bigger market would be better for our industries, exports, balance of payments and employment, what they lyrically called jobs for the boys. The harsh truth is that, from whatever angle we look at it, EEC membership has cost us over a million jobs. Two out of every three jobs lost in recent years have been in manufacturing. The figures which are given in the table on page 58 of Cmnd. 9761, the White Paper before us, tells us that in our trade in manufactures with EEC countries in 1970 the export-import ratio was 137 per cent. In other words, for every £100 they exported to us, we exported £137 to them, a very healthy state of affairs for us. What has happened since? Did we benefit from market membership, as we were told we would? The very opposite has happened. The export-import ratio has declined continuously until last year it was only 71 per cent. For every £100 that they sent us we sent them only £71. From a trade balance of about £1 billion in our favour, we now have a horrendous deficit of some £10 billion. This enormous turnaround is one of the main causes of unemployment in this country.

At the last election the CBI, which now increasingly represents importers and firms that have transferred substantial parts of their manufacturing capacity abroad, said that 2,500,000 jobs depended on our exports to the EEC——

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Leighton: I will not give way.

From the same arithmetic it would follow that 3,750,000 jobs have been destroyed by the imports we take from the EEC, which are now 50 per cent. higher than our exports to it.

If we consume the products of Continental factories rather than British factories, it must mean unemployment here. Thus British jobs have been lost not because of the microchip but because other people are supplying our market. There is no solution to our unemployment without turning back the tide of imports which has closed down British factories and destroyed the jobs in them. The imports that are doing the damage are primarily from the EEC, in cars, textiles, chemicals, furniture and engineering. EEC imports have displaced British production. The treaty of Rome commits us to accepting levels of imports however high, whatever the cost and however fast they rise.

Ironically, we have handed over responsibility for our trade to the Brussels Commission, the equivalent of rewarding the burglar with the only set of keys. Any future British Government which is serious about strengthening British industry will come up against Common Market rules. If we want an effective industrial or regional policy, if we want to plan and regulate trade, if we want to say that British firms should have national objectives, if we want to deal with multinationals, if we want selective public sector purchasing or a form of exchange control, we shall come up against the restrictions of the treaty of Rome.

So we have to make up our minds. Are we committed primarily to the treaty of Rome, whatever the cost, or shall we give priority to the conquest of unemployment and the revival of manufacturing industry in this country? In the choice between jobs and the treaty of Rome, I have no difficulty or hesitation in choosing jobs.

8.49 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I have for many years been a supporter of the European Community in the broadest possible terms, but I have some reservations about how we might move to majority voting.

We have to live in the real world and to be practical about the Bill. I am a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation and endorse everything that its report says. It says that British industrial and commercial interests must get in on the act early.

I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). He voices the anxieties of many people, but many of those anxieties need not arise if we can be brought into the process earlier. There should be a change in our standing orders and our terms of reference so that the Select Committee can evaluate what is going on early enough. Community jargon has the phrase "avant projet".

Having practised as a lawyer in commercial law concerning the Community, I am aware that many directives reach maturity and get through the Select Committee without sufficient consideration en route. European agricultural organisations tend to get in on the act early, but the same is not true for many others.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary emphasised the wider implications for Britain, which I endorse, and said that the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the British Institute of Management and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce all want completion of the internal market. I envisage many advantages in that, but it would help the Select Committee if organisations made their representations to us earlier when they found matters of concern to them.

Many members of the Committee have examined the European Parliament's powers and we made it clear in our report that we consider the Luxembourg compromise still to be valid. We tend to exaggerate the dangers of majority voting. We live in a global economy but have to keep our interests ahead of other people's. We must have regard to our own interests while working in the EC. I was interested to read what my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade said on 13 February in regard to the multi-fibre arrangement. He said:

> "I suggest that the House approaches the matter from this angle: first — I mention it first and rate it first — are the interests of the people of the United Kingdom". — [Official Report, 13 February 1986; Vol. 91 c. 1109.]

That is an extremely fair way in which to approach such matters. We must respond to a range of issues such as the big bang, which is coming in October.

I have recently served on the Financial Services Bill Standing Committee and have learnt the extent to which we shall be exposed to international pressures in investments, capital movements, competition, biotechnology, intellectual property—in respect of which we have a new White Paper—banking, financial services and telecommunications. In such matters, our commercial and industrial prosperity for the next 20 years is intimately bound up with the EC and I have no intention of turning the clock back. It is essential, however, to keep an eye on what that clock is doing and what its mechanism is achieving to ensure that scrutiny in Parliament is retrieved.

I listened with interest to my colleague on the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), and had much sympathy for what she said. I have received an interesting letter from my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office in which she was good enough to reply to my letter concerning scrutiny. She said that the Government were looking into the Scrutiny Committee's proposals. I hope that she will have some interesting things to say later. I do not think that she will mind my quoting that part of her letter in which she said:

"I accept that this"— majority voting—

"will not be risk-free for us."

It is by no means risk-free, but if we get into the negotiations seriously enough and early enough we shall be able to retrieve a great deal of the initiative which has been allowed to go through apathy and inertia.

We must learn to live in the modern world of Japan, of the United States, of protectionist pressures and of the need to maintain market share, to compete effectively and to maintain a high profile of high quality goods which win markets against international competition. If we do not remain alert to the dangers inherent in the Community's mechanisms, we shall reap the whirlwind. If, however, we use the mechanisms effectively, we shall be able to use the opportunities that the EC offers.

It is over to us. We must bear in mind the consequences of giving legal effect to the proposals in the Single Act. The European Court of Justice will be involved. We must be sure that we know what we are doing. Who will control it all? The Government? Parliament? The Commission? Will we have sufficient input from our trading companies and the professions? Will we ensure that we maintain our people's livelihoods? That is what the Community is ultimately about, but we will not achieve that end unless we monitor closely the legislation that could have the most far-reaching effect on our economy during the next 20 years.

8.58 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish to raise two issues with the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker). They arise from the White Paper and the legislation. First, paragraph 7.7 of the White Paper says that the Transport Council was "unable to reach any agreement on the package of draft shipping legislation put forward in the Commission's memorandum on sea transport."

I believe I am right in saying that cabotage is to be discussed next month at a meeting of the Transport Council. I hope that, as soon as possible after that meeting, the Minister will make a statement about cabotage and about the way in which our EEC partners ignore legitimate British interests relating to coastal transport.

Secondly, will the legislation that we are debating tonight enable the Commission both to protect and to promote the interests of the African, Caribbean and Pacific cane sugar producing countries that export part of their produce to EEC member states? An EEC policy is urgently needed to help to deal with the current imbalances in the world sugar market. Such a policy must aim at solving these problems in the interests, and for the benefit, of the developing countries. The ACP countries have little or no choice but to continue to grow cane sugar, regardless of the price that it fetches on the international market.

I am concerned not only about the producers of cane sugar in the Third world but also about those who are employed in the cane sugar refining industry in Great Britain where there are only two cane sugar refineries. One of them is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). The other is in Greenock.

On 2 December 1985, the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food moved a House of Commons motion on this issue. It said:

"That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8687/85, 9178/85 and 8781/85 relating to the sugar sector and 11172/84 and 8688/85, relating to the reform of the starch regime, and supports the Government's objectives to secure satisfactory agreements on them which take account of the interests of both producers and users of the products concerned."

On that occasion I was fortunate enough to move an amendment that was accepted by the House. It said:

"That this House takes note of Commission Document No. R/1900/73, but declines to approve Commission Document R/1957/74 as it makes no provision either for continuing imports, at fair and stable prices, of at least 1·4 million tons of cane sugar from Commonwealth countries, or for the continued existence of and employment in the port sugar refining industry in the United Kingdom, or for securing longer term supplies of domestically refined cane sugar at a fair price to consumer and producer."
—[Official Report, 2 December, 1985; Vol. 88, cc. 107 and 114.]

If I may be so immodest, I think that this is an example of principled pragmatism.

I am deeply concerned about the crop that is produced by the ACP countries. At the same time, I have a direct consitituency interest in EEC decisions about imports of raw cane sugar and the refining of that sugar in London and Greenock. The Tate and Lyle cane sugar refinery is the only refinery in Scotland. There were many more at one time, particularly on the lower Clyde. That refinery is an integral element of the Scottish food and drinks industry. Its future has to be assured in the interests of my constituents who work in the refinery. It must also be assured in the interests of all those who are employed in the Scottish food and drinks industry.

Paragraph 4.26 to 4.29 of the White Paper deal with the internal and external fisheries regime. Here again, we are dealing with a traditional industry, but in this case it is largely managed — I go further: it is very much controlled—by decisions made in Brussels.

One of the recommendations of the report on fisheries protection of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, of which I am happy to say that I am a member, was:

"All third-country boats fishing in Scottish waters should be required to report to DAFS in addition to, or instead of Brussels".

I would say that they should report to Edinburgh rather than to Brussels and that that reporting system should be as efficient and systematic as the one established years ago in Norway, where it works effectively.

Another recommendation was that the 10 per cent. by-catch limit in the pout fisheries should not be raised. I compliment the Ministers who were successful in resisting the stong pressure by the Danish Government when they sought to raise or maintain the derogation of an 18 per cent. by-catch limit. That is a disgracefully high level. It destroys many young fish which are prevented from breeding and Danish fishermen in particular need to be protected from themselves. I should like to see a permanent ruling on the by-catch limit which does not even go as high as 10 per cent.

On the issue of cane sugar and in the interests of the ACP countries and the port cane sugar refining industry employees, and in the interests of the indigenous fishing industry, much more needs to be done by the Government within the Brussels arena.

9.7 pm

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): There is a theatre in Paris called the Theatre de la Huchette. The play has a cast of eight and the theatre holds an audience of 12 and they have been giving the same play for 45 years. The name of the play is "The Bald Prima Donna". That is no reflection on the state of the hair of any hon. Member who has intervened recently, but it fairly well reflects the value of the debates that we have in the House on this subject.

First, the Bill and the quaintly named Single European Act to which it gives effect are the bare inadequate minimum needed to prevent the 12-nation Community from collapsing into inertia and chaos. Secondly, the Government's policies in the EC inadequate, grudging and laggardly though they are—I except from any strictures that I make my hon. Friend the Minister of State whose attachment to this cause has been exemplary throughout, like her predecessor my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind)—have at least been better in the sense of keeping the Community afloat—just—and keeping the British public opinion reconciled to the idea of Community membership—just—and better than those on offer from any of the other Opposition parties.

Thirdly, the EC, cruelly though it has disappointed even the most modest hopes placed in it, is none the less better than any alternative organisation which could conceivably be brought into existence to replace it, given the much diminished quality of European statesmanship today compared with 30 years ago, and incomparably better than a reversion to the kind of crude nationalist power horse trading, with no binding rules at all, which is what the enemies of the Community in the House and outside apparently want. The key phrase is "binding rules" and that is what the Bill is about.

Those who talk about the vital importance of maintaining our untrammelled right of veto on all decisions undoubtedly strike a responsive chord in the hearts of the British public, although they somewhat overlook the fact that other nations—usually Greece—can use their veto to block decisions which are absolutely vital to this country's interests.

I support the Bill, modest though it is. In the words of Audrey in "As You Like It", it is "An ill-favoured thing, sir, but mine own;"

It is the best that we have and we will have to put up with it.

9.10 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): This long debate has been enlivened by the learned and lively, if short, contribution from the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer). We know that the hon. Gentleman when referring to "The Bald Prima Donna" was not in any way referring to his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for whom we know he has a deep and abiding affection.

Throughout this wide-ranging debate we have heard a variety of views expressed and I admit that a range of views has been expressed from both sides of the House. We have ranged from the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner), who gave us the long but no doubt extremely relevant saga of Henry and the tee-shirts through the somewhat detailed semantics of the nomenclature about the Assembly, which is now to be called a Parliament. I do not expect that our French partners believe that their legislative chamber is any the less important because it is called an assembly rather than a Parliament. We heard earlier about the drama of the European flag. Apparently it is not to be the stars and stripes—as we might have expected—but merely to be the stars. It is to have 12 yellow stars on, no doubt with some appropriateness a blue background.

Some very important and serious points have been raised during the debate. [Interruption.] I understand that more encouraging news has come from Wembley about the England versus Scotland football match. My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton) is the bearer of that news. As usual in European debates, many Scottish Members are present, and we were not sure whether we were being deprived of our places at Wembley through our duty to the House. Earlier this evening we thought we were fortunate to be closeted in the Chamber as Scotland were losing, but it now appears as if things are improving as Scotland are back in contention.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) raised a serious point in relation to scrutiny and the adequacy of scrutiny in this Parliament, and other hon. Members also raised that point. The Opposition have frequently said that we are only touching on the margin of proper scrutiny of the legislation coming from the European Community. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) also stressed that point.

Today, as has been evident, as well as discussing the Second Reading of the Bill, we are considering the sixth-monthly report of the Community. Some of my hon. Friends who have raised issues on that have found difficulty in making their points adequately.

On 5 March a number of suggestions were made to the Government and, somewhat surprisingly, the Government accepted the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends. That amendment called for a report and improvements in scrutiny arrangements. I asked the Minister a number of questions on that occasion but did not receive many answers in the correspondence that followed. Perhaps she will answer some of my points now.

When will we get the response to the suggestions that were made for improving scrutiny? When will we get a report? When will our proposals be considered, and when will we get a response to them? We are concerned that scrutiny should be improved within the House and Parliament as a whole.

We are dealing with a modest and, perhaps, reluctant Bill. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will understand that I am not referring to him.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that I have been in my place from the moment that the debate began and that I have not been called to participate in it. He will be aware also that, being a unionist, union means something to me. But if talk about union within Europe is in the same context as union in Scotland, even the hon. Gentleman will understand that that is not quite what we in Scotland believe should happen.

Mr. Foulkes: I allowed the hon. Gentleman to intervene because I realised that he was anxious to speak and had been in his place throughout the debate. I listened carefully to his intervention but I am not sure exactly what he meant or why I gave way to him.

The modest Bill that we are discussing — this may have been forgotten by some of us, and perhaps conveniently by some Conservative Members — is the result of the Milan debacle. The Prime Minister had a tantrum, became intemperate and threatened not to attend the intergovernmental conference. At one stage she would have nothing to do with it. Yet less than a year later we are discussing changes which the Government thought at the time of Milan were unnecessary, unwanted and diversionary.

Let us consider some of these doubtful changes. The new formula of consultative arrangements for the European Parliament is described as new co-operation with the European Parliament. Some Conservative Members may have doubts about the Opposition's views on a number of European Community issues, but if the increased powers that are proposed are at the expense of the non-elected Commission within the Community, we shall consider them sympathetically. That will be our response if the balance of powers within the Community and the delegation of powers are to be changed. If the proposals are to be implemented at the expense of sovereign Governments and sovereign Parliaments, however, we shall examine them more sceptically and be more concerned about them.

The proposals before us do not involve too drastic changes, although we have some concerns. There is to be an extended procedure of Second Readings and the European Parliament will be able to re-examine as well as examine the proposals that come before it. The arrangements for scrutiny in this Parliament will be even more extended and even more difficult. The Foreign Secretary has claimed that the Community's decision-making procedure will be streamlined, but the proposals in the Bill will have the opposite effect and the procedure will become far more cumbersome.

We find it somewhat strange that unanimity will be required for the Council to amend a proposal that has been re-examined by the Commission after being sent back by the Parliament when unanimity is to be abandoned in areas that are of great concern to us.

That brings me to the extension of qualified majority voting in areas which reflect the capitalist views that are so prevalent on the Conservative Benches. Qualified majority voting will be required on issues relating to goods or action to maximise profits, for example, but not on workers' rights, on the interests generally of those in employment or on enlightened labour legislation, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley referred when talking about parental leave, for example.

Mr. Cash: If the hon. Gentleman reads the list of requirements, he will find that there is a minimum requirement covering the health and safety of workers. If I may say so, he is not quite correct.

Mr. Foulkes: I have read the requirements and there are many of them. On balance, I believe that I am correct. The unanimity requirement still exists for issues which the Secretary of State for Employment and others in his team hold so dear. There is this worshipping of the internal market above everything else. Everything, it seems, however important it may be, is being sacrificed to getting some development in the internal market.

Even here there are some contradictions between what is said on one side of the Channel and what is said on the other side. A sort of switch happens somehow in the air between the continent of Europe and the United Kingdom.

For example, in the 1986 Commission programme we are told that a

"large, frontier-free Europe can only succeed if it is accompanied by greater economic and social cohesion."

Yet the Prime Minister, when she came back from Milan, said:

"It is important that the internal market be completed, but I think it can be completed keeping the unanimity rule."

So even in that area there is a contradiction.

In the important area of technology co-operation we also see contradictions. On page 14 of the Single European Act we see that "The community's aim shall be to strengthen the scientific and technological basis of European industry."

But we saw during the Westland saga and the debate over British Leyland that, although the importance of European co-operation was being underlined, it was being sacrificed and sabotaged by some Conservative right hon. and hon. Members because of their commitment to co-operation with the United States of America.

The Commission urges the Community to be united on questions of high technology transfers, intellectual property rights and other things, so why, in the 1986 budget, was the budget allocation for research and innovation cut by 16 per cent.? Why are we not supporting increased funds for EUREKA and the ESPRIT programme? Why are we not supporting this kind of technological co-operation at the European level, the importance of which was described so eloquently by the former Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who resigned, we understand, on this issue? Why are the Government not supporting that instead of collaborating in the unwanted, unpopular and potentially very dangerous star wars programme with the United States? How can Europe strengthen its scientific and technological basis when its scientists and their work will flow across the Atlantic?

Another important issue which is included in the Single European Act but not in this Bill is the question of foreign policy co-operation, political co-operation, within the European Community. It is on the issue of foreign policy co-operation, as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and other hon. Members have pointed out, that we see the double standards and the duplicity of the Government in highest relief. The Single European Act, to which our Government are a signatory, calls on all Governments to

"endeavour jointly to formulate and implement a European foreign policy."

It says that Governments will undertake

"to inform and consult each other on any foreign policy matters of general interest".

It says also that Governments will

"avoid any action . . . which impairs their effectiveness as a cohesive force in international relations or within international organisations."

Where were these expressions of intent, these agreements to which the Government were a signatory, in the decision to withdraw from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation? Where were they when the Prime Minister gave consent for British bases to be used for the American bombing of Libya?

The Prime Minister herself said in a paper which she presented to the Fontainebleau summit, entitled "Europe: The Future"—because she was not anticipating then the demand that would be made on her by President Reagan—

"By common action of the Community and the Ten, Europe must impress on the United States that unilateral American action . . . will put the success of Alliance consultation and co-ordination at risk."

The Prime Minister said that? Where did we hear an expression of that when she agreed to the illegal bombing of Libya from United Kingdom bases? [Interruption.] As international lawyers who know about it have clearly said, it was illegal under international law. In the same document the Prime Minister said:

"Member states must take more seriously their solemn commitments to take account of partners' views and work for common positions."

How did the Government take account of partners' views and of common positions when they took the unilateral decision to co-operate with the United States of America in that illegal air strike? From UNESCO it is clear that we did not take the European position. Britain was a fig leaf for the Americans who did not want to be the only country withdrawing from UNESCO. It is clear that in the bombing of Libya the Government did not take the European position but were a political fig leaf for the United States. Let us hope that in a third and vital area of foreign policy, in relation to central America, about which President Reagan is currently putting forward a distorted and twisted view of the political reality, the Government will take the European view and not act as Reagan's poodle as they have done in other areas.

Some hon. Members on the Government side describe the Opposition view and the view of some European countries as anti-American. [Interruption.] We hear it again in barracking from a sedentary position. That is a simplistic and distorted view and I suggest that it is also a mischievous view. We are against some aspects of the foreign policy of President Reagan and the present US Administration, but that does not mean that we are anti-American, against the people of the United States of America.

It may come as a surprise to some hon. Members on the Government side when I say that I and my colleagues disagreed with some aspects of British foreign policy and British domestic policy, but that that does not mean that we are anti-British. The same logic applies to the United States. I endorse the argument of many of my hon. Friends that it is the Conservative party that is unpatriotic and not the Opposition. We saw that in the saga of British Leyland and Westland and we see it in the way in which Conservative Members encourage the investment of British capital overseas.

Mrs. Chalker: Nonsense.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Lady will have an opportunity to refute my arguments more eloquently than by saying nonsense from a sedentary position.

One of the other issues untouched by this Bill is the imbalance of the Community budget. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) spoke about that, the runaway expenditure on the common agricultural policy. As my hon. Friend said, the money is not going to the farmer; it is going to the owners of the cold stores and the grain silos. Those are the people who make money because a large amount is spent on storing and destroying the surpluses, and that is not always done in support of the farmer. The scandal we heard recently about butter and beef being exported to Libya at preferential prices caused great indignation.

The budget crisis in the Community is much worse than the Government will admit. It is much worse than most hon. Members realise. The structure of the funds of that budget are in deep trouble. Some regional and social expenditure is already frozen. I hope that the hon. Lady will tell us the effect of the freezing of regional and social funds for projects in the Community. We are told by placards and other means when money from these funds is being spent in the United Kingdom. I hope that the hon. Lady will tell us the effect of freezing those funds. We see from today's newspapers that the farm Commissioner admits that agricultural expenditure will push the expenditure of the Community through the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling. As Conservative Members will know, Spanish and Portuguese farmers are no fools. That rise is before taking account of the fact that they will get advisers over to tell them how to make the most out of the intervention support that they can get from the CAP and about all the extra help that can be obtained by increasing production. Even the current predictions for budget overspend will, in reality, prove modest.

But, of course, there will be the usual juggling, fiddling and holding over of expenditure in order to try to balance the budget. There will no doubt be requests for supplementary budgets, and requests following inter-governmental agreements. Despite our questions, we have never yet been told by any Minister what guarantee there is that there will be no further demands for additional spending during the current financial year. If a local authority in the United Kingdom asked for more money, it would be in difficulties. If, for example, that authority was Liverpool or Lambeth, it would be dragged through the courts. But that does not happen to the Community. It has an open-ended agreement to spend, and seems to have a blank cheque from the Government.

Given the growing commitments, the demands on the regional and social funds, and the fact that agriculture expenditure is out of control, it is not surprising that one area of expenditure is being pushed further and further down the list of priorities. I refer to the United Kingdom rebate. The Minister shakes her head, but perhaps she will confirm later that not one penny of the 1985 refund has been paid. When will it be paid? Can she confirm whether the much-vaunted automaticity will apply? My information is that, given the way that the Community budget is going, it will not apply. But I am prepared to be corrected by the Minister and to accept her assurances if she can give any.

As the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West pointed out, in such debates the same performers often make similar speeches. There are sometimes different stories, anecdotes or nuances. But those speeches reflect the fact that during the past two years the Government have wasted their opportunities in the Community. At the end of those two years we are no nearer to solving the fundamental problem to which hon. Members constantly seek a solution. We are no nearer to controlling agriculture expenditure. Despite repeated assurances that there will be strict budgetary control, we keep hearing that that expenditure is out of control. We have seen no real action to tackle unemployment, let alone to reverse the growing tide of unemployment which Jacques Delors described at the beginning of his period of office.

We ask the House to oppose the Bill. A year ago the Government themselves said that such a Bill was unnecessary, irrelevant and would divert us from the real problems facing the country and the Community. I hope that the House will oppose the Bill tonight.

9.33 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): As usual, and as might have been expected, we have had a lively and wide-ranging debate. The views of some hon. Members would be very depressing if we did not take account of economic facts, the common sense of industry and of speeches like those of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon), my hon. Friends the Members for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and of many of my other hon. Friends. How right my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham was when he said that we should seek to deepen and broaden co-operation where it is to our mutual advantage. That is exactly what we are aiming for, and exactly what the Bill will assist us to do.

After all the efforts that we have made to achieve a stronger Europe, it is saddening to find how closed some minds still are to opportunities in the wider Common Market of Europe. I refer to the collaboration in research and technology and co-operation to get better use of regional development funds. We need to look forward to the needs of Europe in a changing world.

Many misconceptions have been voiced by opponents of the Bill tonight, but we should be reminded of what the Bill is about. It gives effect, in United Kingdom law, to the changes in the treaties establishing the European Community. These were agreed by the Prime Minister and other European Community Heads of Government in Luxembourg in December 1985. These are the first such changes since the Community institutions were first formed in 1957, and, as many would say, it is high time that we moved the European Community into line with the great changes that have occurred in this country. The Bill not only gives effect——

Mr. Budgen: Tell us what that means.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend, who has been absent for a large part of this debate, is well aware of the technological and many other changes that have taken place in nearly 30 years. If he has not, I wonder what he is doing in the House now, because he must have been deaf to what was going on.

The Single European Act, which will become a Community treaty, makes provision for a number of important areas. First, there is the limited extension of qualified majority voting to meet the important 1992 target for the completion of the internal market. I shall come back to this in a minute. Secondly, there is the updating of the treaty to take account of the policies on technology and environment to which a number of hon. Members and right hon. Members referred. Thirdly, there is the reference in the treaty to the European regional development fund and better co-ordination of the structural funds. Those are all matters which we believe to be important.

Fourthly, there is a procedure for co-operation between the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament, where the linkages have not been good enough in the past and must be improved. Fifthly, there is the establishment of a court of first instance to relieve the overload on the European Court of Justice, where over 50 per cent. of its cases concern internal staff matters. Sixthly, there is co-operation on foreign policy. Those are all issues which, from time to time, hon. Members have said are necessary. They are being combined together in a useful piece of legislation.

What the Single European Act will not do—and I think it is worth emphasising this—is that it will not lead to a federal union, which is so much feared by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins). The emphasis will be on political and practical co-operation. It will not enable the European Parliament to force its views on the Council, and it will not affect the Luxembourg compromise. It will not give the Commission a say in running foreign policy. All these fears have been expressed during the debate. What it will do is to enable members of the European Community to work more easily together for the mutual benefit of each of the 12 member nations in the years ahead.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) made some play, as did the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), of the whole question of why the Bill was being introduced and asked why we had to amend the treaty, bearing in mind that my predecessor, my right hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) and others, said both before and at the time of the Milan compromise that there would be no need to amend the treaty.

Let me take hon. Members back to the situation at the time when my right hon. and learned Friend made his comment. We always believed that we should be able to make progress by political agreement, but at that time there were certain wide-ranging and ill-considered amendments. We did not believe that those would be to the advantage of the Community or this country. At that time we thought that they might not go away, but we were able to focus the discussion on the limited treaty changes in which we believed. We managed to focus the discussion on practical objectives. Those are the practical objectives with which the Bill deals — the completion of the Common Market and improved efforts in research and development. Those are both in themselves very important for the creation of employment.

I am sorry to find that yet again certain Opposition Members have turned opportunity into failure. What we did at Milan and through the inter-governmental conference following Milan was to turn what had started as unfavourable to our advantage. That is a worthwhile result. If the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley had any experience of this, which he has not so far had, he would know that it is worth while to change from an unfavourable position, with which we would not have joined, to one which will benefit this country.

Mr. George Robertson: We are all intrigued to hear the explanation of how humiliation was turned into triumph. May I remind the Minister of one more sentence of her predecessor, who is now Secretary of State for Scotland? In the debate last June he said:

"Those who wish to see an intergovernmental conference of the kind recommended by the majority in the Dooge committee, with a view to amending the treaty, are misguided about the best way of making progress in the Community." — [Official Report, 20 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 473.]

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman knows exactly why that was. It was because some of the Spinelli proposals and other ideas that were put forward in that committee were not in line with the way in which the Community needed to develop. They have since been dropped.

I must return to some questions that were posed by hon. Members. My right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) asked about a special Committee to consider the Bill. The Bill will be fully considered by a Committee of the whole House. That reflects the importance of the measure. I believe that that is the answer that most right hon. and hon. Members want to hear. Therefore, it would not be appropriate at this stage to establish a special Committee procedure.

Several hon. Members were, not for the first time, excited because they believe that the Bill will remove the United Kingdom's power of veto, give greater powers to the European Parliament and reduce the role of other institutions. I am afraid that those opponents of the Bill are allowing themselves to be drawn into an unreal world.

I shall deal first with the Luxembourg compromise. What was it? It was a political agreement that, where majority voting applies, a member state should be able to ask for a vote to be postponed where it considered its important interests to be at stake: to delay and postpone, possibly indefinitely. It was never enshrined in the treaty. What is enshrined in the treaty are the rules on unanimous or majority voting according to the different topics which the treaty covers. No doubt we shall come to that in Committee.

We did not lightly agree to move from the veto inherent in unanimity to the lack of an absolute treaty-based veto inherent in qualified majority voting. That was why the treaty changes are limited to those areas where majority voting will serve our long-standing objective — the completion of the internal market. That is why we have retained essential safeguards for small and medium-sized businesses and in health matters. In these circumstances, the Luxembourg compromise is an additional, but not our principal, safeguard. It is not affected by the Bill.

We successfully and explicitly invoked the compromise on the fisheries question under the last Labour Government in July 1978. Others have done so more recently. Therefore, the compromise is not dead. It is still there, and will remain there. More usually, it is used implicitly. Discussion continues until a compromise is reached that is acceptable to all delegations. The Luxembourg compromise is a weapon of last resort, but we need it in the last resort, and I sincerely hope that none of this will come to the House at some time in the future.

Mr. Leighton: To give an example of when the Luxembourg compromise worked the Minister has had to go back to 1978, which is a long time ago. She knows that the Germans stopped us using the veto on agricultural prices. Who decides when the Luxembourg compromise can be used?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman poses a question dating back to 1982. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said at the beginning of the debate, the reason why our attempted use of the Luxembourg compromise did not succeed in 1982 was that the grounds were not relevant to the case that we were putting. However, since 1978 the Luxembourg compromise has been successfully used by the Danes on fish, the Irish on milk, and Italy on steel. If we need to use it in future, we will do so.

I can only say to the hon. Gentleman that when a member state's important interest is at stake it is right that discussion should continue until agreement is reached. We propose that this should be done through special procedures to ensure that the Luxembourg compromise is used only when it is really necessary and that, in general, discussion should continue to reach a reasonable answer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said by way of intervention that an enhanced role for the European Parliament would mean a reduced role for other institutions. That is a dangerous fallacy. That is not the position; life is not a zero sum game. By enabling the European Parliament to play a more effective and constructive role in European affairs we can increase the potential of the institutions. The point of decision remains with the Council, but in future it will be able to take decisions with more knowledge of the views of the Parliament and more time to take account of them. That should improve the role for the European Parliament that we agreed, on our accession to the Community, should be part of the future development of this country.

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mrs. Chalker: I am coming to my hon. Friend now. He said that the Bill should be opposed because we should be using existing powers to solve existing problems. I see the point he seeks to make. Of course, we must ensure that the Community tackles the existing problems, such as the problems of agricultural surpluses, which must be reduced. We have been seeking to do that, but that is no reason why we should refrain from making changes aimed at solving other problems of equal importance, such as the continuing lack of a real internal market. There is no reason to pass up opportunities for the future just because we have to attend to problems that already exist.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Can the Minister answer the simple question we have been asking through the whole debate: what has changed since July last year? The Minister has said that we need majority voting to complete the internal market. Does she recall that the Prime Minister said, to the acclaim of hon. Members on both sides of the House, when asked about completing the internal market:

"It is important that the internal market be completed, but I think it can be completed keeping the unanimity rule."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 189.]

Most of us would wish to keep the unanimity rule on directives which could be quite vital to many of our industries. That was the Government policy in July, which was supported. What has changed?

Mrs. Chalker: When the intergovernmental conference sat down to discuss all the matters involved, it was not just other Ministers but the Prime Minister as well who accepted at the Luxembourg meeting that there was a better way of achieving a speedier and more thorough completion of the internal market. Thus we are not immovable; we are prepared to do what is right for the future of the Community and not to be blinkered, as my hon. Friend would have us blinkered.

I will write to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) on his question about voting procedures, as time is short. Above all, we have sought only to work with majority voting where it could be in our interest. We have selected areas on that basis. Some have implied that there is majority voting against United Kingdom interests. There is no question of that. There is no reason why we should continue to insist on a consensus where no member state has an important interest at stake. We cannot criticise the Community for its inability to take decisions, while, on the other hand, we refuse to allow practical improvements that could well assist us in achieving what we stand for.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked specifically about the European cancer initiative. That is an area in which we wish to see effective action. A group of distinguished experts, on which the United Kingdom is represented, is meeting to consider the details. I will write to the hon. Gentleman about the matter.

Hon. Members have commented on a wide variety of issues, including cabotage and sugar. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development is en route to the EEC-ACP conference in Barbados, where we hope to secure a real answer to the problems that we discussed over a month ago. There has certainly been movement in that area.

The hon. Member for Hamilton made a number of comments about political co-operation. He said that there had been nothing more than statements. We have certainly had a great deal more than statements. There are plenty of examples. Some of them may never hit the press because they are successful and quiet. They occur because of positive action taken between Foreign Ministers meeting, not only in formal sessions on European co-operation, but in the margins of those meetings. It was with some difficulty that, in January, we eventually found a solution and made some moves on terrorism. They were not what we all wanted. We knew that we would have to do more. We therefore set up a working group to consider further ways of coming together to prevent terrorism.

We have worked together on the issue of South Africa. I recall the complete ban on Argentine exports to the EEC that was imposed within days of the invasion. We have also co-operated in less visible ways on practical matters such as consular help and evacuation plans. In the case of the evacuation of Aden, the EEC members played their part. There was also the case of the evacuees, leaving via Zaire, who had been captured by UNITA. Such consultations are all part of the business of political co-operation. People are wrong to reject statements by the Twelve as unimportant. When the Twelve speak together with one clear voice they can do far more than they can do individually. That was certainly the case in the meeting that I attended with my right hon. and learned Friend last Monday, when we made an important step forward that has not been mentioned today. The 12 countries agreed not only that they would expel unwanted people from their own countries but they would co-operate so as not to allow those people into any other part of the Community. That was the first time that such a degree of political co-operation had been attained.

Mr. Foulkes: Why is the hon. Lady looking at me?

Mrs. Chalker: If the cap fits, wear it.

I believe that it was the hon. Member for Walthamstow who said that political co-operation did nothing for the North-South question. He said that we should use the Commonwealth instead. In reality, our partners in Europe are well aware of the importance of the Commonwealth. Many of them wish that they too had the connections that we have maintained through the Commonwealth. They are also well aware that they have a role in assisting the developing countries—not only the Commonwealth ones — and that role is much discussed in a number of different ways.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked how the European political co-operation secretariat could be made accountable. The secretariat is there only to help the presidency. It works under the authority of the presidency on tasks which are delegated at the presidency's discretion. It does not carry on in its own sweet way, which is what the hon. Gentleman implied by his remarks. It is there to take on the administrative burden of political co-operation which is currently shouldered entirely by the presidency. There will be only six officials on secondment from their national Administrations. They will have a small support staff, and each presidency will retain full responsibility and control for all that goes on politically. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's question.

From the many comments that have been made it is clear that not all hon. Members realise how important a Community policy against inflation and unemployment is. Tackling unemployment is a major priority of the Community. All the member Governments of the Community, be they Left or Right, agree that that can be done through a consistent economic policy framework to improve supply and demand. In 1984 the Council agreed that sustained growth could be achieved only in the context of moderation in the evolution of real wages and a pause in the growth of current public expenditure.

Mr. George Robertson: Spending on infrastructure?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, and spending on infrastructure. I shall come to that shortly if the hon. Gentleman will allow me.

The Community also agreed that the key to the creation of jobs was to open up the internal market, not just for goods, but for services and professions. We have already heard how long it has taken to achieve success and agreement over the professions.

We shall also have the establishment of European standards for products and an improvement in the Community's performance in advanced technology. Those have all been long-standing goals of this country. I remind my hon. Friends that they are all also major aspects of the Single European Act. It is due to an initiative of this Government that the Community is now committed to lifting the burdens on business and enterprise by rigorously examining the regulatory burden of existing and new Community legislation. The Community has a very important role to play there and in promoting labour market flexibility. That is a key issue in the creation of employment opportunities.

It was President Kennedy who said that the rising tide lifts all ships. That is true. If we sustain a soundly based growth this will be the key to the very thing that hon. Members are asking about in tackling the problems of unemployment.

Growth in the United Kingdom was higher between 1983 and 1985 than in any other member state, despite the miners' strike. We shall continue, as we have done in the past year and longer, to create more jobs in this country. We need those greater markets and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said, we need to use the mechanism effectively.

Opposition Members do not seem to realise the factual position. There is no proposal to freeze the social or regional funds. In fact, the 1986 budget shows an increase of 20 per cent. for the regional and social funds. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley obviously wants me to deal with budgetary matters. In the time available I must say that whereas there has been disagreement about how we proceed, we are determined to contain the spending of the agricultural budget. The European Parliament has also given its name to that in the past week.

I was asked about the scrutiny procedures. We hope to take up the idea for further information to be contained in explanatory memoranda—we are willing to accept that recommendation. We are also willing to accept the second idea, that Departments should be on the alert to pick up anything that occurs after a submission of an original explanatory memorandum. I will write to the hon. Member for Stafford about the third recommendation. It is not as easy to address.

We are in our 14th year of membership, the 29th year of the Community. We have to look forward far more actively and take up opportunities. We need to build for the future. We need better research and development, better technology and better industry. Vision and practicality are needed to get the best opportunities for Britain and Europe. To achieve that, we need to update the treaties in unison with 11 other member countries. The Bill helps us to do that, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

British Pensioners (Canada)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

10.14 pm

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I want to raise the plight of British old-age pensioners who are living in Canada. At the moment there are about 41,000—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will wait just for a moment. He will not lose time. Sir John Farr.

Sir John Farr: I wish to raise the plight of British old-age pensioners who are living in Canada. At the moment there are about 41,000 British old-age pensioners in Canada. The fact that they are there does not mean in any sense that they have turned their backs on Britain. Many of them are proud to retain their links with Britain. They went to Canada for family reasons, possibly because their last living relatives are there and they decided to join them.

Most of these people paid full national insurance contributions during their working lives in Britain. However, the moment they left our shores, the pensions for which they worked all their lives were frozen. Many of them spent a full working life in Britain and did not leave this country until late in life.

I submit that this is manifestly unfair and unjust and that no civilised country should tolerate it. I am glad to say that this Government and previous Governments have worked out with no fewer than 27 other countries throughout the world a social security agreement or convention, whereby British pensioners living in those countries are entitled to receive regular uprating increases in their pensions. But that list does not include Canada.

Why is this? Why has Canada been excluded from a reciprocal agreement with many other countries in the world? As I have already said, there are about 41,000 British pensioners in Canada. Due to the absence of a social security agreement, no fewer than 20,000 of them receive a pension of less than £10 a week. In Canadian terms, that is about $15. I know from correspondence with the pensioners or their representatives that the hardship involved is very real. One may say that for one reason or another they chose to live in Canada and that the Canadian Government should assist them in their time of need. However, the Canadian Government will not provide financial help for people unless they qualify for financial aid by having been resident in Canada for at least 10 years.

Both Westminster and Whitehall are not unaware of the paradox that faces British pensioners in Canada. As long ago as the 1970s our Government expressed interest in a social security agreement with Canada. In 1983, United Kingdom officials said that the Government might be prepared to allocate the necessary funds. Indeed, later that year the need for an urgent agreement was discussed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Mr. Trudeau at a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

However, in November 1983 the Canadian Government were informed that the British Government could not proceed with the social security agreement, and there the situation remains. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary told me only last Friday in reply to questions that I tabled on this, officials from his Department and the Canadian Department of Health and Welfare have work in hand on the agreement but the finance "is not available".

[Sir John Farr]

What finance is needed? In another reply last Friday my hon. Friend was kind enough to say that annually to uprate would cost about £4·8 million in the first year. I can possibly add a little more information because of my understanding of the discussions that have been taking place. As I understand it—I am speaking with fairly good authority — the tentative agreement that was reached between Canadian and British officials but not implemented at the end of 1983 would have cost the British Government £4 million in uprating pensions for the first year and the Canadian Government $21·5 million.

I was a little disappointed that in his reply to me last Friday my hon. Friend mentioned a figure of £35 million as a possible cost to the United Kingdom Government. I was disappointed because, for a start, I did not ask him what the cost would be of bringing up the level of the pensions of all pensioners in Canada to that of pensions in Britain today. My question was what would be the cost of annual uprating, which is about £4 million or £4·8 million per annum. The cost of £35 million which my hon. Friend included in his reply is the cost of a full uprating. All I am asking for at this time is, as happens in every other country with which the British Government have a social security agreement, not the full uprating but simply the payment of increases as and when they become due in Britain.

Another point which my hon. Friend mentioned in his reply to one of my questions last Friday was that the cost of uprating in the first year would be £4·8 million, "rising progressively". But I question whether that figure is likely to rise markedly at all, simply because, if my hon. Friend looks at the available statistics for 1966 and 1967, which were important years for British emigration to Canada, no fewer than 74,000 Britons went to live in Canada. Such has been the change since then that in the past two years for which figures are available, 1983 and 1984, the figure of 74,000 has been reduced to only 7,000.

There has been a change in the pattern of emigration from Britain to Canada. I accept that if one did not take into account the fact that by natural attrition many of the existing British pensioners in Canada will have died, perhaps by the year 2000 the cost could be £35 million a year. But the statistics that I have relating to subsequent emigration from Britain show that the cost is unlikely ever to be one of which the British Government should not be able to shoulder with ease and great pleasure.

Finally, I would like to stress that there is no other country in the world in which Britons live in some numbers, apart from South Africa, where we do not have a social security agreement. In every country where, for one reason or another there are sizeable pockets of British people living—except South Africa for obvious reasons —there is a social security agreement that entitles those Britons to have the right to pension upratings.

I hope that we can provide for British pensioners in Canada in the same way as we have provided for them in EEC countries and in Australia, the United States of America and all other civilised countries where such pensioners live in some numbers. We should do for those pensioners in Canada what we do for others elsewhere.

I am very proud to be associated with some of the achievements of the Government. I only hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to assure me that we can show a little generousity and so recognise what is an obvious case of manifest unfairness in relation to British pensioners in Canada.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) presented his case, as ever, with force and clarity, and I will endeavour to reply to the important points that he made.

I would first like to congratulate my hon. Friend on his constancy and his commitment upon this issue which he has pursued, as the House will know, for many years. If I may say so, I think that British pensioners in Canada are fortunate to have my hon. Friend as their advocate in this House.

The present position for expatriate United Kingdom pensioners in Canada, as my hon. Friend is well aware, is that their pensions are paid at the rate in force when the pensioner left this country or, alternatively, when he first qualified for a pension if he was in Canada at the time he reached the appropriate age. At present, pensions are not subsequently uprated; that is the substantive cause of my hon. Friend's concern.

The background to that position is fairly clear. Until July 1955, British pensions were payable outside this country only within the Commonwealth or for short periods of absence. In July 1955 the National Insurance (Residence and Persons Abroad) Amendment Regulations 1955 came into force. Those regulations made provision, for the first time, for United Kingdom pensions to be paid anywhere in the world. There was no provision for the pensions which were to be paid abroad to be uprated.

The reason for that decision was that it was considered at the time that the social security system was primarily designed for people living in the United Kingdom. As my hon. Friend will know, the national insurance fund, then as now, is run on a "pay-as-you-go" basis rather than on a strict funding basis. That means that each year we estimate expenditure and set the rate of national insurance contributions so as to produce an income which will roughly match expenditure. The estimates of expenditure allow for the fact that pensions paid overseas are in general not uprated and would clearly have to be amended were that circumstance changed.

The purpose of the review and uprating of pensions was to ensure that they retained their value in relation to the cost of living in the United Kingdom. Also, as the cost of increasing benefits falls mainly on contributors and employers in the United Kingdom, it was at that time considered unreasonable to ask them to bear the cost of increases paid to people who have voluntarily left the country, in the absence of a social security convention. My hon. Friend mentioned the convention and I will return to that point later. Successive Governments have endorsed that general policy.

At this point I should explain, for it is entirely relevant, that the United Kingdom has agreements on social security with a number of other countries and these are properly called bilateral conventions on social security. At present there are 31 such agreements. They vary quite widely in scope but broadly their main aims are to ensure that a person working abroad does not have to pay contributions for two social security schemes at the same time and that the benefits that should accrue from any contributions paid are not lost.

Some agreements allow for pensions to be uprated but about 60 per cent. of United Kingdom pensioners living abroad do not receive pension increases on an annual uprating basis. There already exists an agreement on social security between the United Kingdom and Canada which has been in force since 1959, but that is limited in scope and does not cover pension uprating. Unfortunately, in 1972, when the United Kingdom Government proposed a comprehensive agreement with Canada which would have included pension upratings, the Canadian authorities were unable to enter into negotiations. Since 1972, a situation has developed where financial constraints have prevented the United Kingdom from concluding an appropriate agreement.

In Canada, the number of people receiving United Kingdom pensions at the end of 1985 was over 56,000, rather more than my hon. Friend mentioned. The number has matured and grown a little in recent years. To bring their pensions up to the level of pensions paid in the United Kingdom would cost about £35 million a year. I shall return to that sum in a moment because my hon. Friend referred to it specifically.

To pay the future cost-of-living increases alone, ignoring past increases, would cost £4·8 million in the first year, and that cost would rise progressively. I return to the sum of £35 million, for our calculations are that the figure would rise progressively to precisely that sum of £35 million over a period of years. My hon. Friend queried whether that cost was accurate, and in the light of what he has said and his long knowledge of these matters, I shall ask to have it re-examined and re-checked to determine whether it is.

My hon. Friend will be aware — he could scarcely fail to be so — that Government spending is subject to strict constraints and that the cost of entering into a comprehensive social security convention with Canada would need to be assessed alongside the Government's priorities for improvements to our domestic social security system. The resources are not available currently to make all the desirable improvements in social security that the House would wish.

Among the points raised by the British Pensioners Association of Canada — a formidable body — is the suggestion that, because pensioners living in Canada do not use the National Health Service or the United Kingdom social services, it should be possible to offset any savings against the cost of uprating their United Kingdom pensions. I fear that it is not possible to trade that off quite so simply, even if it were possible to quantify the savings. The NHS and social services are part of the social structure that is available to residents here and they are financed on that basis. To draw an analogy, we do not give a cash benefit to those who opt for making private arrangements; nor could we do so for those who decide to live overseas.

What is the position of a British resident in Canada in relation to the Canadian social security system? Persons emigrating from the United Kingdom to Canada can receive a Canadian residence-based pension when they have completed a minimum of 10 years' residence in that country, while 40 years' residence is needed for a full Canadian pension. Those who satisfy the 10-year residence requirement may also be eligible for the means-tested guaranteed income supplement.

I am aware of the concern of the British Pensioners Association of Canada about the effect that the exchange rate can have on United Kingdom pensioners living in Canada. The law allows for the payment of United Kingdom pensioners in sterling rates only, as it would not be fair, or practicable either, probably, to adjust the amounts of pension to take account of the innumerable fluctuations which occur in the exchange rates between sterling and other currencies. That has clearly been a circumstance over recent years and that problem will be well understood.

Pensions will continue to be paid in sterling, but I am pleased to mention to my hon. Friend that we have managed to arrange improvements in the way in which pensions and other social security benefits are paid to beneficiaries living overseas. My Department has awarded a contract to the Bank of Scotland to make these payments by credit transfer. The new system of payment, when it comes into operation — I hope that it will be later this year — will be much quicker and more efficient, in our judgment, than the present method. What is more, in addition to receiving their payments earlier, pensioners will get better exchange rates and a reduction in bank charges. The new arrangements will be available to pensioners in Canada and I hope that that will be thought to be a small but worthwhile initiative.

My hon. Friend touched particularly upon the fact that officials of the DHSS and their Canadian counterparts have been working on the preparatory technical matters for a comprehensive social security convention between the two countries. I should like to assure my hon. Friend that that work is proceeding. In the light of all that I have said, that is clearly the way forward on the problem that concerns my hon. Friend.

Unfortunately, I must reassert that, until the necessary finance is available, it will not be possible to make any substantial progress on this matter. However, we judge that it is possible to continue discussions so that we can proceed as quickly as possible once we are in a position to make the money available. Although my hon. Friend will, I know, appreciate that this evening I can give no positive undertaking to provide for the uprating of United Kingdom pensions payable in Canada in the near future, I assure him that we propose to continue work on these preparatory matters and shall certainly keep the matter firmly in front of us. I know that my hon. Friend would ensure that we did so were there to be any backsliding.

I will study with care my hon. Friend's remarks this evening and will draw them to the attention of my right hon. Friend. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing this important matter once again before the House.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): The Minister has not made a very convincing case. Can he tell me how many of the pensioners in Canada are in receipt of means-tested benefits? Why is Canada the only country with which it seems to be difficult to negotiate an agreement?

Mr. Major: I do not know precisely how many pensioners in Canada receive what the hon. Gentleman refers to as means-tested benefits. I can tell him that there are 56,000 pensioners in Canada. That was the figure that was mentioned some time ago.

It is not a question of there being any unique difficulties in the negotiation of a convention with Canada. There are a number of countries with which we do not have conventions that permit the uprating of pensions. Speaking from memory, I believe that this also applies to Australia and New Zealand, in that pensions are payable there but there is no annual uprating following the conclusion of a convention. The problem exists with a number of countries.

Although we have what might be called comprehensive conventions with a large number of countries—I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough mentioned the precise number — the system is not universal. In a number of countries — moreover, countries with which we have a long, historic and close relationship—that benign circumstance does not apply.

We take no pleasure from the fact that this problem exists. That is why we are keen to continue the technical preparatory discussions that are going on at the moment, so that, when we have the financial resources, we shall be able to proceed with the minimum of delay. But I fear that, unpalatable though the position clearly is to my hon. Friend, the financial constraints are genuine and have to be borne in mind. I am not in a position to go further this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

1. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to adopt the title civil protection for civil defence.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): We are considering possible alternative titles, including civil protection, and will announce a decision in due course.

Mr. Aspinwall: Has my hon. Friend initiated any research into the public perception of the term civil defence and, if so, what were its findings?

Mr. Shaw: Yes. Last year we introduced some attitudinal research data on the awareness and understanding of civil defence. This has been most helpful in the preparation of the revised publicity material, which we hope to be able to issue in the course of this year.

Overseas Visitors

2. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the last investigation took place where visitors to the United Kingdom were recorded as not having re-embarked; how many such visitors were investigated and what kind of evidence was accepted as proof that a particular visitor was no longer in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): Very recently, since the investigation of apparent overstaying by persons subject to immigration control, including visitors, is a continuous but selective process. Acceptable evidence of departure, in the absence of a computer record, would vary from case to case.

Mr. Proctor: In view of the concern that visitors coming into this country are not checked out, despite the modern computer aids available, will my hon. and learned Friend reinvestigate the matter, because the crime of overstaying is important and serious and needs attention?

Mr. Waddington: I must correct my hon. Friend. It is not true to say that those who are admitted as visitors are not checked out. Three hundred thousand passengers who were landed last year were landed on check-out conditions. Our records confirm embarkation in 95 per cent. of cases. It is a great mistake to imagine that all the others have not left. Experience shows that all too often when the case of someone who is not recorded on computer is followed up it is discovered that he has left.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister confirm that overstaying among visitors is not a problem? Indeed, his figures show that only 187 of the 18,000 people refused permission to enter last year absconded. Will he also confirm that the Home Office has taken over part of the Post House hotel at Heathrow to accommodate those who are awaiting interview, often for days, and that that problem would be greatly improved if more than eight interpreters were employed at Heathrow to interview visitors?

Mr. Waddington: I cannot answer the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question. However, I shall write to him and give him what information I can. On the first part of the question, one must neither exaggerate the extent of the problem nor minimise it. I must point out that no fewer than 1,280 overstayers were investigated and indentified last year.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that without a complete check on re-embarkation it is impossible to know the size of the problem of overstaying? In view of his recent written answer to me, which showed that only 5 per cent. of visitors are so recorded, does he not think that it is time we took firmer measures to ensure the re-embarkation of those who enter as visitors?

Mr. Waddington: The number of people involved is the main problem. Six million people were admitted as visitors in 1984, and millions of people go through immigration control as they leave the country, and no matter how diligent the immigration officer is, he cannot always spot that someone who passes him was admitted to the country on check-out conditions. We have to be selective and follow up the cases where we have reason to believe that there has been a breach of the law and overstaying.

Mr. Meadowcroft: How many of those who were refused leave to enter but given temporary admission actually absconded?

Mr. Waddington: I do not have figures before me now, but they have been provided before when questions on that specific point were raised. I am prepared to write to the hon. Gentleman to give him the information that he requires.

Mr. Budgen: Will it ever be possible to deal with the problem of overstaying without introducing a system based upon identity cards?

Mr. Waddington: Many people in this country would be very reluctant to see the introduction of identity cards. The decision to abolish the use of identity cards was received with loud acclaim and we would have to be very careful before reintroducing them.

Prisoners (Medical Condition)

3. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has completed his consideration of advice to prison authorities and guidance to medical officers given by his Department, following his consideration of the case of Kevin Capenhurst.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): We shall be issuing additional guidance in the near future to governors and medical officers of all Prison Department establishments. This will remind them of the need to give prompt consideration to the possibility of special remission of sentence under the royal prerogative of mercy for prisoners who are suffering from terminal illness or are bedridden or similarly incapacitated. I shall place a copy of that guidance in the Library when it is issued.

Mr. Janner: I thank the Minister for that helpful reply and I am glad that at last some step is to be taken in this matter. However, is the Minister aware that a reminder to medical officers is seldom sufficient to achieve the required result, and that what is needed is that the Minister himself should be informed when one of the very few prisoners who are terminally ill is refused permission to go home or elsewhere to die in dignity? When will he institute instructions that he should be informed about such cases?

Mr. Mellor: I should like to stress two points to the hon. and learned Gentleman, whose interest in these matters is well known to me. First, the guidance note which will be sent out will make some alterations which will be of assistance to ensure that these cases are dealt with even more effectively in future than they have been.

Secondly, on the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about Minister's being notified, I am anxious not to establish bureaucratic procedures which will slow down and not speed up the process of releasing people in genuine cases. Where there are cases of difficulty, these should be reported immediately to Ministers.

Hong Kong

4. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Legislative Council of Hong Kong on the proposed Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order.

Mr. Waddington: The Legislative Council made representations asking for an endorsement about visits in the British National (Overseas) passport and it asked that British citizenship should be granted to former service men in Hong Kong and to British dependent territories citizens who were not ethnically Chinese. My right hon. Friend announced the Government's response yesterday in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan).

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that China understandably refused to grant citizenship to non-Chinese residents in Hong Kong because they are a British responsibility? Does he accept that it is outrageous and unreasonable for the Government to refuse — as the Home Secretary has refused—British citizenship to that group of people? We simply cannot use people when it suits our purpose and then discard them when it does not. Is he aware that these 11,500 people will become stateless unless the Government change their mind? May we have some reconsideration of the Government's decision?

Mr. Waddington: The right hon. Gentleman has raised a number of points. First, the Chinese Government have confirmed that non-Chinese who meet the legal requirements under the Chinese nationality law may apply for Chinese nationality and that such cases will be dealt with by the appropriate authorities. Giving the non-ethnic Chinese British citizenship would not secure for them what they want—the right of abode in Hong Kong. They will not be left stateless. All British dependent territory citizens will be entitled to BNO status, and those who do not apply and have no other nationality will become BOCs, a status which will also be available to their children and grandchildren.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the category of British nationality known as British dependent territory citizenship is a fundamentally unsatisfactory method of dealing with the problem, and that after 1997 the numbers in that category will be so small that it might well be desirable to abolish the category and appropriate them within the category of British citizenship?

Mr. Waddington: I cannot agree with my hon. Friend. I think that the decisions that are being taken are right. I repeat that no one will be left without a citizenship. Those who are now BDTCs will be able to apply for the new status of BNO. If they do not apply, again they will not be left without citizenship, because they will be entitled to BOC status.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

6. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the progress in setting up neighbourhood watch schemes in shire counties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In December 1985 there were some 3,850 neighbourhood watch schemes operating in shire counties, which was more than double the number recorded in January 1985.

Mr. Colvin: That is indeed good news, but does my hon. Friend agree that chief constables are probably wise to proceed cautiously with neighbourhood watch schemes, perhaps on a pilot scheme basis, in order to ensure that they have the wholehearted support of the general public, without which the schemes will not only fail but could be an additional drain on police resources, which are scarce? Where the schemes are proven to be effective, will he consider increasing police establishments to enable more schemes to be set up, because neighbourhood watch schemes may help prevent crime and catch criminals, but they require additional policemen?

Mr. Shaw: I am very sensitive to my hon. Friend's point. Those neighbourhood watch schemes which are stimulated from within the community, arising perhaps from consultative councils such as that which is being established at Eastleigh in my hon. Friend's constituency, may well not be as manpower intensive for the police as those which are established under police intiation. However, I accept my hon. Friend's point that, like so many other police activities, all should be assessed in relation to police establishments.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Minister accept that neighbourhood watch schemes may have considerable value in some areas, but that the public are provided with far better protection if people living in rural areas can see the occasional policeman walking through their village or small town? Will he take steps to ensure that chief constables are aware of their responsibility to have more policemen on foot in the shire counties?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. and learned Gentleman should be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has invited chief police officers in all counties and, indeed, in the metropolitan areas, to make representations in relation to establishment, and he is currently considering many applications. Neighbourhood watch schemes and all the other activities that are mounted around those schemes have resulted in a welcome reduction in burglaries and I hope that that will be applicable in rural areas as well.

Mr. Rathbone: May I put the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) in a slightly different way? Is my hon. Friend sure that insufficient numbers of policemen are not holding up the introduction of the schemes in many places?

Mr. Shaw: We are concerned at having sufficient police available, amongst other things, to enable us to stimulate crime prevention measures such as neighbourhood watch schemes. There is a role here for special constables, which we are currently examining.

Mr. Clelland: Is the Minister aware of the excellent neighbourhood watch scheme set up in the Northumbria police force area, which, along with the metro transport system, the new metro shopping development and the setting up of regional drug squads, has placed considerable pressure on manning levels in that police force? When will the Home Secretary reply to the request from the Northumbria police authority in letters dated 22 January and 15 April for an increase of 75 in the manning of the Northumbria police force?

Mr. Shaw: I am aware that Northumbria, amongst others, has made an application, and I know that each of those applications must be carefully considered. We shall respond to that application, as to the others, as soon as possible.

Mr. Conway: Is my hon. Friend aware of the progress which has been made in Shrewsbury with the neighbourhood watch scheme? Is his Department encouraging chief police officers to expand the special constabulary and to link them in with the neighbourhood watch schemes? That would increase the number of foot patrols in shire areas.

Mr. Shaw: We are requiring all chief constables to take a view of all their resources. My hon. Friend will be aware that the numbers in the special constabulary are entirely a matter for the individual chief constable. There is little doubt that they would be a useful adjunct to crime prevention activities.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister take into account the fact that there ought to be neighbourhood watch schemes in the counties of Oxfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, Berkshire and all those areas where the Americans have bases? We need people to keep an eye on the criminal activities of President Reagan and those who allowed him to bomb Libya and other countries——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is very wide of the question.

Mr. Skinner: If the Government will not keep an eye on him, somebody has to do it.

Mr. Shaw: I suspect that that is a little outwith the neighbourhood over on which I was answering questions.

Sexual Offences

7. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he now intends to introduce legislation to reform the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 as it relates to the anonymity of those accused of rape.

Mr. Mellor: We have this matter under consideration. There is a strong case for removing the accused person's right to anonymity, but a final decision has not yet been reached.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: Although I welcome my hon. Friend's answer, does he agree that as the Act now stands suspected rapists, alone of any criminals, enjoy anonymity? It is inequitable that anonymity, which should rightly be given to the victim, should also be given to a suspected person, especially when there is a danger of that suspected person committing other rapes, since he has not been arrested.

Mr. Mellor: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ashley: The Minister may be aware that I brought in the original Bill to help rape victims, and I sympathise with the Government's view. I wonder whether the best way to approach this matter is to preserve anonymity for men accused of rape, because it is such an appalling crime, but to identify men accused of it when they have committed another crime. Would that not be the best solution?

Mr. Mellor: It is a halfway house. It is true that rape is a grave crime, but so, too, are murder, attempted murder, buggery, and assaults on young children, all of which lead to the identification of the defendant. The right hon. Gentleman will have read what the Criminal Law Revision Committee said about the provisions for the anonymity of defendants and its detailed criticisms. We must bear in mind the committee's findings as well as the right hon. Gentleman's comments when considering this matter.

Sir Peter Hordern: When will my hon. Friend announce his decision? Will he give us an assurance that it will be made in a much shorter time than the decision about dog licences?

Mr. Mellor: I have responsibility for a number of interesting matters but, happily, dog licences are not among them. I know what my hon. Friend means and I can assure him that a decision will be made in such a fashion that, if it is favourable to remove anonymity, that could be included in the Criminal Justice Bill next Session.

Mr. Corbett: Given that there is no centrally held evidence that the anonymity provisions of this Act—which started life as my private Member's Bill—have in any way inhibited police inquiries, will the Minister at least undertake to consult widely on any plans to remove the anonymity provision for the accused man? Is the Minister prepared to advance the time at which the complainant woman gets the protection of anonymity to when that complaint is made?

Mr. Mellor: I know that the hon. Gentleman has previous convictions on this subject—[Laughter.]—and I shall want to have a word with him about that in due course. I take his point about the anonymity of the victim. Recent events in Ealing have revealed to us how unsatisfactory it is that anonymity for the victim comes into play only at the point when an arrest is made, although we saw in that case that the damage can be done before then. I shall want to look into that matter and to have a word with the hon. Gentleman about it.

Police (Training)

8. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what increased provision has been made for police training in respect of additional discretionary powers to be conferred on the police under public order legislation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department is in close touch with chief officers of police about the training implications of the Public Order Bill, but clearly this will depend on the final form of the Bill when it completes its parliamentary passage.

Mrs. Clwyd: But why force these powers on the police in the first place? They do not want them. They bring the police into party politics. The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has asked for similar powers to be taken from him. If the Government are so insistent, why not do this through the democratically elected local authorities, as in Scotland?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Lady will bear in mind that the Bill emanated from a review by a commission, the publication of a White Paper and from substantial discussion of the need to modernise the Public Order Act 1936. The Bill also has the approval of the House and is making progress. I look forward to the Bill continuing to make progress in the House.

Mr. Kaufman: Bearing in mind that at times 7 per cent. of the Metropolitan police force are on duty at stalag Wapping to facilitate the distribution of what Mr. Rupert Murdoch laughingly describes as his newspapers, and bearing in mind also the 17 per cent. crime clear-up rate in London, what additional resources are the Government providing for the Metropolitan police to assist them in carrying out their proper duty of coping with the record crime wave in London?

Mr. Shaw: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the requirements placed upon the Metropolitan police to deal with public order matters are very broad and wide. They are not confined to what is happening at Wapping. The right hon. Gentleman knows full well that there is a substantial requirement for public order policing, whether it be at international soccer matches at Wembley or protecting persons from difficulties while processions and marches pass through the City. I assure him also that the request of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis for increased manpower is currently receiving very substantial consideration.

Mr. Greenway: Are not the Government putting twice as much, in real terms, into police resources to enable them to do their job as the last Labour Government provided for the police? The Opposition Front Bench spokesman does nothing but attack the police in vicious and unpleasant ways. In doing so, he is in line with the former Labour-controlled Greater London council and the Labour police committees that are to be found throughout the metropolis.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is quite right. By the increase from £1·1 billion to £2·8 billion this Government have demonstrated their determination to improve police resources. The thoughts of the right hon. Gentleman made the front page of The Times the other day. When he talks about police firmness and effectiveness, he might at least start by advising those members of his party who are in control of London boroughs that they should take a more effective view of the police than they do now.

Police (Compensation)

9. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce a scheme to compensate police officers or their families injured or killed in the course of their duties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Special provision is already made in the police pensions scheme for police officers who retire as the result of injury on duty and for the dependants of those who die from such injuries.

Dr. Marek: How can the Minister sit on the Treasury Bench with equanimity when the Government of which he is a member pursue policies which in recent times have led to an unparalleled increase in crime and violence in our society? How can he sit on that Bench and expect our policemen and policewomen to carry out his laws when they have to rely, if they are injured, on completely unsatisfactory pension schemes and completely unsatisfactory compensation from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board? The Minister knows that it is high time that something was done about it.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman must recognise that the pension scheme provisions that are made for the police are substantial. The widow of a police officer who dies as a result of injuries on duty is entitled to a pension of 45 per cent. of her husband's average pensionable pay. If he died in special circumstances, such as attempting to save life, his widow's pension would be 50 per cent. of her husband's pensionable pay. The hon. Gentleman is aware that many other substantial benefits are available to deal with the situation. However, may I take him firmly to task for believing that we should be any the less committed to ensuring that there is proper policing of public disorders, purely because there is the real difficulty of dealing with officers who, on many occasions, face substantial injury as a result of looking after the public peace on behalf of many right hon. and hon. Members and the people outside Parliament.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my hon. Friend, when looking into the matter of police compensation, consider the dramatic changes that are occurring, with the growth of terrorism, in the tasks of our police and others working in the public service?

Mr. Shaw: I share my hon. Friend's concern, and I know that compensation for injuries, which do not necessarily lead to retirement, is a matter for current discussion between the Police Federation and my Department.

Mr. Loyden: Will the Minister examine the long delays in settling criminal injuries compensation cases? For instance, a policeman injured in the Toxteth riot had not received settlement after three years. Is that situation satisfactory?

Mr. Shaw: I assure the hon. Gentleman that every case that comes before the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board will be most carefully and speedily dealt with, because we all recognise the importance of ensuring that proper payment is made.

Sir John Farr: Will my hon. Friend assure me that the malicious damage that has occurred to the homes of police officers in certain parts of the country will be properly considered? Will compensation be given to officers who lose not only their homes but their belongings as well?

Mr. Shaw: I would like from my hon. Friend details of that occurrence. It may be that it occurred in a part of the United Kingdom with which I am not very familiar.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about compensation for families of police officers in Northern Ireland who have died at the hands of paramilitary groups? Why do the Government not interfere with the sourcing of money to fund those groups? What can the Minister say about what happened in The Hague yesterday, when the Home Secretary was approached by Mr. Alan Dukes, the Irish Justice Minister, who asked the British Government to act to ban kidnap insurance as it affects Ulster? What will the Government do about these matters — sit on their backside as usual?

Mr. Shaw: The first thing that the hon. Gentleman might do is to vote in favour of the prevention of terrorism legislation. He has the effrontery to attack the Government for doing what they have done, when, consistently, the Labour party has voted against that. On the question of my right hon. Friend's motives in consulting other security Ministers on the matter, the hon. Gentleman has made remarks that are scarcely worth even ignoring.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend consider the plight of police drivers who, in answering 999 calls or hoax calls, are involved in car accidents? As a result, many of them are off work for many weeks, and some, unfortunately, die. Will the Minister guarantee that payment for the relatives of those police officers, who were doing their best to protect our country, will be speeded up, because many of them are still waiting for such payment?

Mr. Shaw: I assure my hon. Friend that an officer who retires as a result of an injury on duty — and that includes response to calls as described by my hon. Friend —is entitled to an ill-health pension, an injury pension, and an injury gratuity. If totally disabled, he is also entitled to a lump sum payment of five times his pensionable pay.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister accept that his miserable and evasive replies on this question demonstrate that the Government have no concern for the police other than in words? Is it not a fact that the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and the private insurance pension schemes available for the police are grossly inadequate for many of the injuries and deaths that occur? Does he not agree that the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board takes far too long and delivers far too little?

Mr. Shaw: I understand that when the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) seeks to try to reassert his new-found interest in protecting the police he is looking for ways and means of doing so. I assure him that this Government have done a lot to improve police pay and conditions. I accept that there may be a case for further improvement, but he will recognise that, in relation to public service provision, that which is now available to the police service represents the top that can be paid.

Mr. Hume: Is the Minister aware, following the question of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), that previously in the House the Prime Minister has agreed with me that the ransom insurance that exists in this country encourages kidnap and ransom? In the light of the Prime Minister's answer, can the Minister say why nothing has been done to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is very wide of the subject, but the Minister may answer the question.

Mr. Shaw: I take note of the hon. Gentleman's proposal. I should like to invite my right hon. Friend to write to the hon. Gentleman about that provision.

Drugs (Customs Investigators)

13. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take to encourage the public to use the new telephone lines to Customs drugs investigators.

Mr. Mellor: Customs and Excise has already taken steps to encourage the public to use the new Freefone facilities. There was a press launch on 7 April, posters and leaflets have been distributed; and all Customs regional offices have instructions to publicise the facilities. In the first 11 days of operation 353 calls were received, and some very good leads have been established.

Mr. McCrindle: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply. Are there any plans to publicise the scheme by using posters in post offices? Many members of the public go into post offices, and the use of such posters might contribute even more to the success of the scheme.

Mr. Mellor: There have been negotiations between Customs and the Post Office. At first they appeared unpromising, because the Post Office initially seemed to want to impose a fee to display the posters. This morning I discussed the matter with the chairman of the Post Office. I hope that more positive counsel will be given to those conducting the negotiations.

Mr. Haynes: It is all right for the Under-Secretary of State to talk about involving the general public with a special telephone line, but when will the Government reinstate the Customs officers they have sacked since 1979 and really do something about that problem?

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman will have to find another basis for his outrage, because some 500 extra preventive staff — [Interruption.] That was not an invitation to show further outrage. A further 500 preventive staff are to be recruited in the period April 1985 to April 1987.

Mr. Rathbone: Although I welcome the scheme, does my hon. Friend agree that it will come to nothing if Customs officers are not placed where they can track down the places from which drugs are smuggled, especially in Bombay? Will my hon. Friend report on the Government's efforts to get Customs inspectors there?

Mr. Mellor: It is troubling that so much of the heroin arriving in this country has been dispatched from India. The proportion last year was 49·1 per cent. of all heroin seized. The trends in the first three months of this year show that perhaps as much as two thirds of the heroin seized by Customs has been dispatched from India. I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary discussed those matters with the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of India during his recent visit. I hope that the good level of co-operation that has been established between the law and order services in Britain and those in India will be furthered by the placement of drug liaison officers, who have done so much to cut the trade in heroin between Pakistan and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Frank Cook: What controls of that kind have applied at United States military bases in Britain?

Mr. Mellor: United States military bases are under the control of internal United States security services, which take action against personnel on bases who are found dealing with drugs.

Mr. Spencer: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a foreign element in an increasing number of cases coming before the courts, which shows the importance of the Government liaising with foreign Governments to stamp out the supply of drugs at its source?

Mr. Mellor: That is absolutely right. That is why we take so seriously the bilateral relations that we have with a wide range of countries which produce drugs which are exported to the United Kingdom. That is also why we take seriously Britain's role as chairman of the Pompidou group of Ministers in Europe, which is concerned with drugs. International co-operation on drugs is not an option, but a necessity.

Overseas Representatives (Fascist Parties)

17. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on the admission to the United Kingdom of elected representatives from other countries who belong to Fascist parties.

Mr. Waddington: Cases are considered individually in accordance with the immigration rules.

Mr. Winnick: If it was right for the Home Secretary to prevent an American from coming to Britain recently —and I believe that the Home Secretary was absolutely right — why should elected representatives of Fascist parties, for example, those elected in France and one Nazi elected in Israel, be allowed to come to Britain to spread their racial mischief and poison?

Mr. Waddington: Every member of the Government abhors racism, but to prevent anyone coming here just because he belongs to a party to which racist views are attributed does not seem to be justifiable. Clearly it would be another matter if he were coming here to propound racist views. Any question of excluding M. Le Pen would have to be considered in the light of the circumstance prevailing at the time and would have to take account of the fact that he enjoys certain immunities and privileges by virtue of being a Member of the European Parliament. MEPs are not liable to detention in a member state while the Assembly is in session; nor can MEPs be hindered when travelling to or from the Assembly.

Mr. Adley: While I would not wish to be associated with the point that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has made, will my hon. and learned Friend nevertheless consider the fact that it was an election by proportional representation, which seems to encourage the election of people with extremist views to Parliament?

Mr. Waddington: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right to bring that to the attention of all of us and point out one of the follies that would result from the introduction of proportional representation in this country.

Mr. Mallon: Is the Minister aware of the underlying Fascist influence on events taking place in Northern Ireland, and that already members of a Fascist organisation have appeared in court in Northern Ireland on charges related to violence? Will he assess the relationship between that Fascist party and parties that are represented in this House?

Mr. Waddington: This question is directed to the admission of people to the United Kingdom. The matter raised by the hon. Gentleman does not bear on that problem.

Terrorism (Toxic Chemicals)

19. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what detection equipment will be available to police and fire services and local authorities to monitor the presence of toxic chemicals in the event of terrorist use of chemical weapons or materials.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It would not be in the interests of security to disclose details of the equipment which might be deployed to combat terrorist activity.

Mr. Walker: While I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, may I ask whether he agrees that, in the light of state-sponsored terrorism and the fact that weapons of this kind are becoming much more sophisticated, the action taken in the last week or two has been valuable in dealing with the matter? Does he further agree that it is important to see that we are equipped to deal with such action properly and effectively should it ever happen?

Mr. Shaw: I think my hon. Friend is right to say that in the present climate of Government-backed terrorism every possible contingency should be covered, and I wish to give my hon. Friend the assurance that contingency plans exist for dealing with a whole variety of possible terrorist activities.

Prison Services (Privatisation)

20. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the likely savings during 1986-87 from contracting out of services by the prison authorities.

Mr. Mellor: The cost of services contracted out by the prison department in 1984-85—the latest financial year for which figures are available — was £55 million. Because most of the work has been contracted out for a number of years, we cannot provide a sensible estimate of the savings involved.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that the use of more contracted-out services should not only lead to more savings but reduce the likelihood of industrial disputes?

Mr. Mellor: As a general principle, I am sure that there is a great deal in what my hon. Friend says. He will know of the special difficulties in the prison service, part of which is that a number of prison services are provided for the benefit of the regime by the prisoners themselves.

Mr. Hoyle: Can the Minister say what savings have been made by allowing 49 prison officers' houses in Culcheth, Warrington to stand empty for the last five years?

Mr. Mellor: Not without notice, Sir.

Burglaries

21. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for England and Wales, what was the number of burglaries in 1985 which were notified to the police but which were not cleared up.

Mr. Mellor: The estimated number of offences of burglary in England and Wales recorded by the police in 1985 but not cleared up is 616,000. Because an offence may be recorded and cleared up in different years, it is not possible to give an exact figure.

Mr. Boyes: Is that figure not absolutely incredible, disgraceful and disgusting? Has the Minister seen the video produced by the Labour party, which shows that in our campaign we put people first? We will put more police on the beat to protect the people on the streets and in their homes.

Mr. Mellor: I think that there is a career in the music hall for the hon. Gentleman if he thinks that such stuff will be taken seriously. If he is interested in videos and in the credibility of the Labour party, he should look at the GLC-funded video which ended with the words,

"Communities must rebel."

The Labour party will not be taken seriously on the issue until it gets behind it the Labour council leaders who are leading anti-police campaigns. It must do that before it tries to persuade the rest of us.

Mr. McCrindle: On a more sober note, does my hon. Friend recall the Prime Minister's suggestion to insurance companies some months ago that they should be prepared to offer discounts on premiums in return for the installation of burglar alarms and other protection? Has he any indication from insurance companies that they have attended to the matter, and is he keeping in contact with them with a view to achieving what my right hon. Friend suggested?

Mr. Mellor: Yes. On an equally sober note, two insurance companies are already doing so, which is very good news.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Eadie asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall attend a state banquet given by Their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain.

Mr. Eadie: Has the Prime Minister had time to reconsider the statement that she made in the House last Tuesday to the effect that the Americans would choose the type of weapons that they would use on aircraft taking off from British bases? If she has had time to reconsider that, does she adhere to the statement that she made on Tuesday?

The Prime Minister: I made it perfectly clear on Tuesday that we had set down very strict criteria for the use of F111s from British bases in this country. Those strict criteria were in the statement that I made, and added to those strict criteria was the duty to minimise civilian casualties. Therefore, it is clear that we were considering only conventional weapons. Nuclear weapons would require totally different procedures. It is absurd to say that they were ever asked for. Within the strict criteria that we laid down, the precise choice of weapons in the conventional sphere was for the United States.

Sir Peter Hordern: Since both the Italian and French Governments are liberalising their exchange controls, and since all the criticisms made by Professor Alan Walters in The Times have either been met or are unfounded, is it not time that we joined the European monetary system?

The Prime Minister: I did not read Professor Alan Walters' book in quite that way. As my hon. Friend knows, it is our policy that we shall one day join the European monetary exchange mechanism, but we do not believe that the time is yet right.

Mr. Kinnock: President Reagan made two speeches yesterday in which he emphasised that he is prepared, as he put it, to act again against Libya. Will the Prime Minister tell us frankly whether she would be prepared to endorse or assist in a further similar raid?

The Prime Minister: I have already answered that question several times. Should there be a further request, it would have to be considered. We would reach our conclusions in the light of circumstances and matters which would have to be considered at that time.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Prime Minister read the interview given by the Secretary of State for Defence to Mr. Terry Coleman, which appeared in The Guardian this morning, in which the Secretary of State said:

"It wasn't our decision to do it, . . . If that question had been put to us, I don't know quite what response we'd have given."

If the President of the United States should again present the Prime Minister with such a fait accompli and say that he will go ahead whatever her opinion, what will be her response?

The Prime Minister: I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman's question, if only he would listen.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister has not answered that question. She is trying to claim that she has somehow mitigated the nature and effects of the American raid. Is it not the case that she has now moved into the worst of all worlds, demonstrating both complicity and impotence?

The Prime Minister: What the right hon. Gentleman is seeking to do is to help the terrorists by letting them know exactly what answer we shall give to a request. I have already told him that if a request were received we would have to consider it in the light of the circumstances at the time.

Mrs. Currie: Has my right hon. Friend had time to read the statements by the Advocate General of the European Court of Justice in the case of invalid care allowances? Will she accept that married women who care voluntarily for disabled relatives at home have much sympathy on both sides of the House? Could not the Government, who do care for the carers, consider making this payment available?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the judgment in that case will not be given until about June. When it arrives we shall, of course, consider it carefully and the reasons for it.

Q2. Mr. Maclennan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Maclennan: Further to the answer that the Prime Minister gave to her hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), does she agree that the exchange rate is now within the central band and that the European monetary system can be adjusted to include us without a major realignment? In view of the strong arguments advanced by Sir James Cleminson, the president of the CBI, concerning the advantage to British industry of entering the mechanism now, should she not listen to the senior members of her Cabinet, who favour entry now; and stop playing this one-man band record on the subject?

The Prime Minister: No. I outlined the general policy to my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern). The time is not ripe to join the EMS. Just because the exchange rate is in a certain band now does not mean that it will stay there. If it did not, one would either have to use scarce reserves artificially to keep it within that limit, or one might be driven to put up the interest rate. We would be much more circumscribed within the EMS mechanism than we wish to be at the moment.

Sir Peter Tapsell: While we are on the EMS issue, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that some of us would prefer to have our affairs managed by the Bank of England rather than by the Bundesbank?

The Prime Minister: I note what my hon. Friend says. I have already said that to join it at the moment would limit our freedom of action, and that is not desirable at present.

Mr. Flannery: Has the Prime Minister noticed the statements that President Reagan has made about Iran and Syria—almost threatening them with the same thing that was done to Libya? Has she also noticed how few Americans are coming over here and that people are deeply worried by the fact that the President of the United States seems to have lost his mind about this business and is literally threatening all mankind with what he will do next if terrorism breaks out anywhere?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the objective is to fight terrorism. If one always rejects the use of force to fight terrorism, the terrorist wins and the consequences for more victims are horrific.

Q3. Sir John Farr asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir John Farr: While the whole House goes along with the "Viva el Rey" speech by Mr. Speaker yesterday in another place, can my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be no change in the sovereignty of Gibraltar, and certainly no change without the consent of the people in that colony?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. The whole House and, I think, the whole country welcomes the state visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain. It is a great success. We know full well Their Majesties' views on Gibraltar. As my hon. Friend is aware, the Government have given assurances to the people of Gibraltar that Gibraltar will remain part of Her Majesty's dominions unless and until an Act of Parliament otherwise provides, and furthermore that Her Majesty's Government will never enter into arrangements under which the people of Gibraltar would pass under the sovereignty of another state against their freely and democratically expressed wishes.

Mr. William Shelton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that when the 30 or more Labour councillors were disqualified at Lambeth they left a rump of three councillors to run Lambeth council? Is she aware that a meeting tomorrow night—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question must involve the Prime Minister's responsibility.

Mr. Shelton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is to be a meeting tomorrow night to reverse the position? Will she condemn the use of force, which I understand will be employed to break up that meeting, and, indeed, any use of force in public life?

The Prime Minister: I think that we would all unhesitatingly condemn any use of force to break up that council meeting. I hope that it takes place tomorrow night and that the Conservatives take over the authority of the council.

Mr. Tony Banks: In the discussions between representatives of the American Government and Her Majesty's Government about bombing targets in Libya, did the Americans at any time say that one of the objectives was the killing of Colonel Gaddafi?

The Prime Minister: No, of course not.

Q4. Mr. Loyden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Loyden: Will the Prime Minister comment on a report that the Tory candidate in the by-election at Ryedale made a statement at a press conference this morning to the effect that we are at war with Libya? Does the Prime Minister approve of that, and does it reflect the attitude of the Government?

The Prime Minister: No, that is not correct. Of course, terrorism itself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] If hon. Gentlemen had had the courtesy to listen, they would have heard what I said. They do not have the courtesy to listen, or courtesy of any other sort. Terrorism is a form of warfare against all other citizens in democratic societies.

Q5. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the voluntary licensing authority should be congratulated on its first year's work in monitoring IVF clinics and research laboratories, work in which this country leads the world in setting the very highest ethical standards?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of my hon. Friend's great interest in this matter. I noted that the first report had been published, and I hope that it will be widely studied, because the organisation's work is excellent.

Dr. Owen: Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the Government are taking every step possible to co-ordinate other countries' actions in refusing Libyan aircraft facilities to land at our airports, and that we are now prepared to adopt sanctions against Libyan air flights both in and out of this country?

The Prime Minister: I think the right hon. Gentleman is aware that if some of the deportees about whom my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary spoke to the House are to go, they will probably have to do so on Libyan aircraft. He is also aware that there are a number of our citizens in Libya, some of whom may want to get out on other aircraft.

Mr. Gregory: In view of the act of terrorism today and the others that we have experienced in Europe so recently, will my right hon. Friend encourage as many Americans as possible to follow their colleagues last year and come to this country to see that it is the safest in the EEC? Will she also give support to the British Tourist Authority in promoting Britain overseas?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I gladly support my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, who is also responsible for tourism. He is doing everything that he can to promote in the United States our tourist industry. My hon. Friend may have heard what someone from the American embassy said this morning—that he hoped that more American tourists would come to this country, which is a safe and good country.

Q6. Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fisher: Does the Prime Minister agree with her Secretary of State for Defence, who is reported in the papers this morning as saying that the precise position and the precise targets were not agreed, and he was not informed about them? Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether she did have precise detailed information of the targets that were to be bombed, or is the special relationship that she has with President Reagan more one of master and servant?

The Prime Minister: I have answered that question in previous statements and speeches. I made it perfectly clear that the Government agreed to the use of United States aircraft based in the United Kingdom if that was necessary in the action of self-defence against specific targets, demonstrably involved in the conduct and support of terrorist activities. We laid down strict criteria. I notice that the hon. Member, like so many of his colleagues, does everything to try to undermine the fundamental relationship between Europe and the United States.

Mr. Kinnock: On a point of order arising directly from questions, and because it is a complete calumny, I want to ask through you, Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister will unreservedly withdraw her statement, made in the heat of Question Time, that I am seeking to help terrorists? That is utterly unjustified, and a vile insult, that is not even acceptable in the bitterest of exchanges in this place.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Prime Minister did say that, and I must confess that from where I was sitting I did not hear it, I am sure that she would wish to correct it.

The Prime Minister: May I make it perfectly clear what precisely, I believe, I did say. I said that if one tells the terrorists precisely what one is, or is not going to do, that is the way to help him. I did not seek to impute anything personal to the right hon. Gentleman, and if that was the effect of what I said, I gladly withdraw it.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. There are rights in this House that belong to hon. Members other than the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, and we are entitled to look to you, to safeguard the rights of all Members of this House. It is within the knowledge of all Members that recently statements have been made in the course of questions and answers, and hon. Members have risen to object. It has been the convention, in my experience in this House, that Mr. Speaker will not allow time to be used for hon. Members to object to comments. I ask a simple question — why have you allowed, on a point of order, a statement from the Leader of the Opposition that you would not have allowed from any other hon. Member?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Prime Minister or any other hon. Member, casts an aspersion on the honour of any other hon. Member, I will always apply the rules. I am the guardian of Back Benchers as much as of Front Benchers, and the same rules apply to everyone.

Business of the House

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

3.32 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 28 APRIL—Until Seven o'clock, Second Reading of the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill.

Motion on the Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Board) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed Private Business at Seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 29 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

Motion on the statement on the New Workers Scheme.

WEDNESDAY 30 APRIL—Remaining stages of the Public Order Bill.

THURSDAY 1 MAY—Opposition Day (13th Allotted Day) there will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "Family and Community Care—Putting People First".

Motion on the Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Grants (Extension of Period) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed Private Business at Seven o'clock.

FRIDAY 2 MAY—Private Members Bills.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the Leader of the House. Next Monday the House will debate the Second Reading of the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill. Because of the widespread interest and concern about the future of the shipbuilding industry, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the Bill is committed to a Committee of the whole House?

Next Thursday, my party will use an Opposition Day to debate the problems of people involved in family and community care. Unfortunately, that debate must, by definition, be a short one. In the light of today's ruling by the European Court of Justice that the Government's refusal to pay invalid care allowance is a breach of EEC law and an example of sex discrimination, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a debate in Government time on this matter, which affects 5 million people caring for sick or disabled relatives at home?

Differences have become evident between the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence about the information given to the Government at the time of the bombing raid on Libya. Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore arrange for the Secretary of State for Defence to make a full statement to the House next week about what he knew, when he was told, and whether he understood what he was told?

Finally, in view of the decision by American businesses and individuals to cancel visits to Britain and other European countries in the latter part of this year as a result of the bombing of Libya, would the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement in the House next week publicising the fact that, even with the terrorist menace, European cities and countries are safer than American cities? Could he not, for instance, draw attention to the fact that the murder rate in San Francisco is five times higher than it is in London, in New York 10 times, in Dallas and Washington 14 times and in Detroit, 22 times higher? London and the rest of Europe are much safer places than the Americans appear to believe.

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful for the points made by the Leader of the Opposition. [Interruption.]

Such language. I feel that we are moving back to a more conventional state of incivilities.

I thank the right hon. Gentleman very much for his most eloquent, pertinent and convincing point about the greater safety of the cities of western Europe when compared with those of the United States, which should give every encouragement to the traditional pattern of tourist and commercial trade to flow from north America to western Europe.

I will draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence the fact that his appearance in The Guardian today has excited widespread interest throughout the House. However, I would have thought that the comments that have been made, not least by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, have put the matter in context.

The right hon. Gentleman quite properly points out that Thursday's debate is one of great significance. I will of course consider through the usual channels his suggestion of a more general debate at some subsequent date. However, I am entitled to remind the right hon. Gentleman that no judgment has been made by the Court. The Advocate General has given an opinion, but we will have to wait some months for the court's opinion.

I can conclude on a cheerful note. I am delighted to accede to the right hon. Gentleman's request that the Committee stage of the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill should take place on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): It is now nearly six months since the Anglo-Irish agreement was signed. Does my right hon. Friend feel that the House should now have the chance to debate its usefulness and the progress that has been made, in view of the unhappy state of the Province?

Mr. Biffen: I will convey that expression of view to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): In view of the statements made yesterday during Environment Question Time, will the Leader of the House today reiterate his commitment that no decisions will be taken over the NIREX orders until there has been a full debate on the report of the Environment Select Committee on the disposal of nuclear waste? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us when that debate will take place?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also tell us when there will be a debate on the Channel Tunnel Bill?

Mr. Biffen: The Channel Tunnel Bill should be before the House reasonably soon. The special development order will be laid as soon as the matters raised during the consultation period have been considered. I will be giving thought as to how best we might meet the wishes of the House in debating the order, as well as taking into consideration the relevant aspects of the Select Committee's report.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that there are three statements to be made after Business Questions. I must have regard for the other business on the Order Paper, so I will allow business questions to continue only for a further 15 minutes. I hope to be able to call every hon. Member if questions are brief.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Has my right hon. Friend seen the article in the Daily Mail for Monday 21 April, entitled, "Scandal of the Dole Queue Door Knockers"? It reveals that more than 600 people in the east midlands and other parts of the country are signing on for the dole and then moonlighting for the rest of the day, earning at least £40 a day. Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate so that we can learn about those abuses and check on the arrangements for signing on, so that people cannot do that? Such a debate might reveal that the unemployment figures are not as serious as they appear to be.

Mr. Biffen: I have been so busy following my hon. Friend's fortunes in The Sun that I am afraid that I have neglected to read the Daily Mail. However, he has raised an important point that is widely seen as such. My hon. Friend may wish to consider raising it on Second Reading of the Finance Bill, as that would seem to be the best immediate prospect.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Leaving on one side the abuses in The Sun and elsewhere, is not the greatest abuse to which the Leader of the House should turn his attention the enormous and persistent unemployment and the Government's fiddling of the figures for the east midlands and elsewhere? When will we next have a debate on unemployment in the east midlands?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I can safely say that the hon. and learned Gentleman will never make The Sun. I take note of the proposition that we have unreliable unemployment figures. There are lively schools of argument about the level of unemployment and the argument is made both ways. But just as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), the hon. and learned Gentleman may find that Second Reading of the Finance Bill is his best and earliest opportunity to raise that point.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): As my right hon. Friend said last week that there was little hope of reviving the Shops Bill, will he consider introducing legislation to bring Scotland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom? That would give Scottish Labour Members the opportunity to explain why their shopkeepers have a freedom that they deny to shopkeepers in my constituency?

Mr. Biffen: Bowing to your exhortation for brevity, Mr. Speaker, the answer must be no.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I did not follow the response of the Leader of the House to the request of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition about the European judgment on disabled people and married women receiving an attendance allowance. May we have a statement on that as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: When the right hon. Gentleman looks at tomorrow's Hansard, he will see that before I came to the Dispatch Box the point had already been made. At present, we still have the Advocate General's opinion, and we do not have the court ruling. The latter is not expected for some months.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Has my right hon. Friend noticed early-day motion 748 on the subject of family courts, which has attracted 78 signatures within a few days?

[That this House welcomes the establishment of the Family Courts Campaign to promote the early implementation of family courts, following the support for family courts recently expressed by the Law Society, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Directors of Social Services and many other bodies; welcomes the recommendations of the report of the Matrimonial Causes Procedure Committee, particularly those relating to the establishment of conciliation in matrimonial proceedings; notes with concern that the report by the Law Commission on Family Law, Illegitimacy, has yet to be implemented; further notes that the joint study set up in July 1984 by the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to re-examine the idea of a unified family court, and study the resources implications in terms of finance, manpower and accommodation is due to be published shortly; regrets that this study has been so long delayed; and urges the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to come forward with proposals for legislation at the earliest opportunity, following the publication of their report and their subsequent consultation on the most appropriate model for implementation.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware of the mounting impatience among hon. Members and many organisations at the very protracted delay in the publication of the Government's study on family courts? May we expect a statement next week?

Mr. Biffen: I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will be anxious to consider responses to that idea before coming forward with any proposals. I shall most certainly draw my right hon. Friends' attention to the point made by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate on the report by the Select Committee on Transport on toll crossings, which was published some two months ago? Would that not give right hon. and hon. Members the opportunity to remind the Secretary of State for Transport that Britain now has some 4 million people unemployed and that many of the worst affected areas have toll crossings which are a restraint on trade?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it is usual for a Government response to have been made to a report of a Select Committee before there is consideration of a debate. However, I shall certainly look into the matter.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Can we have an early debate on the extra cost of the Labour party's election bribes so that we can find out whether it will cost the taxpayer another £24 billion, £39 billion or £46 billion? [Interruption.]

Mr. Biffen: Opposition Members must not get so excited. I was overwhelmed by the modesty of my hon. Friend's observations. I feel that they can all be put to a helpful test on Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Many members of the Tory party are anxious to see that compensation is paid to victims of the bombing outrage during their conference—rightly so in my view. Will the Leader of the House ensure that there is a debate which looks at the position of compensation for the innocent victims of the recent bombing outrage by President Reagan? Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that that is considered, because it is an important international issue?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that I can helpfully add to what was said in the recent Adjournment debate on the Brighton bombing. As to the wider issues mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, the answer must be no.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Now that the Leader of the Opposition has announced that the Labour party is half in mourning, by adopting grey in place of red as the party colour, will my right hon. Friend confirm that we are still true blue and very much alive?

Mr. Biffen: Yes. I think that there will be much entertainment during the next few weeks and months as the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition leads his party towards the ground he wishes to share with social democracy. [Laughter.]

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Does the Leader of the House realise that his reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), could be understood as meaning that the debate on the Select Committee report on radioactive waste could coincide with the laying before the House of the special development orders? Does he realise that there is such widespread nationwide anxiety about this issue that if he wants to mobilise opposition further that is the best way to do it? Will he give the House an assurance this afternoon that that is not the intention of the Government? It is not good enough.

Mr. Biffen: I gave a carefully considered answer. If I were to go beyond it, I would create ambiguity.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): A number of hon. Members from the Conservative party also applaud the Select Committee on Transport's proposals to abolish tolls on estuarial crossings. It would be helpful to have a debate on that subject before the Government reply to the Select Committee report, so that the argument may be advanced that the main costs on providing those estuarial crossings was to continue the exceptional benefits to shipping on the estuaries rather than to provide exceptional benefit to local car users?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point and emphasising that this is in no sense a party political issue. I hope that he will reflect that there are advantages in a Government reply being available on a Select Committee report before it is discussed.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Has the Leader of the House seen my early-day motion 773 about the very unfair procedures which are being adopted against the objectors who want to see Marylebone station remain open? It is on a line which affects more Conservative Members than Opposition Members.

[That this House, noting that objectors to the closure of Marylebone station and the withdrawal of services thereto and therefrom have been unable to obtain information necessary to the full production of their cases against the closure, urges British Rail to make available to objectors details of the financial case for closure.]

If we cannot have a statement about that, will he draw it to the attention of the Secretary of State for Transport and persuade him that to receive a deputation from the mostly Conservative-controlled councils in order to discuss the rules and regulations governing the procedures for objectors who wish to keep the line open—as against British Rail, which wants to close it?

Mr. Biffen: As I understand it, that decision is essentially a matter for the board of British Rail, and it is still taking evidence and making judgments on that. However, the hon. Gentleman raises a point which I know he would wish me to convey to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport; I will certainly do that.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Would my right hon. Friend arrange for an early Government statement on the alleged disappearance of the red flag? Has that item officially been reported as missing?

Mr. Biffen: There is a limit to the breathless ditching of symbols that can be undertaken even by a party that is thirsty and in a hurry for office. However, as far as the conventions of the House are concerned, my hon. Friend had better consider that the ambit of the Second Reading of the Finance Bill is, as always, mercifully wide, and he can slip his point into that debate.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): In view of the Government's continued support for American state terrorism, not only in the central Mediterranean but in Nicaragua and Angola, is it not time that we had a general debate on foreign affairs so that we can specifically examine the so-called special relationship between the Prime Minister and President Reagan?

Mr. Biffen: I always enjoy the hon. Gentleman's contributions because they remind us that he at least is on the slow passage back to social democracy. I will certainly draw the hon. Gentleman's request for a debate to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House make time available to discuss the persistent and regular undermining of Her Majesty's Government position in terms of fighting for democracy and freedom against terrorism, which has continued since the Falklands crisis and which continues today? We should have the opportunity to expose those Labour Members who have so consistently tried to undermine the strict and decent stands that Her Majesty's Government are taking.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made his point with such effectiveness that no added debate is necessary.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the very significant numbers quoted by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in terms of homicides in American cities, could the Leader of the House find some way of publicising those figures, as all hon. Members want the health of the British tourist industry strongly maintained? In terms of American visitors, there is a strong incidental advantage in that, away from the malign influences of the American media, some American visitors begin to learn some of the political facts of life in the world today by visiting this country?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot comment on the hon. Gentleman's second point. In connection with his first point, I hope that he will join me in a sense of charity towards his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and a belief that when his right hon. Friend makes a good point that has sufficient validity to make its own publicity.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): In view of the concern about security, would my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate, so that we can discuss the special relationships that seem to exist between some trade union leaders and Opposition Members, such as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), and the Libyan Government?

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the House would be interested in a general debate about security. However, in all charity to my hon. Friend, the debate should be brought into a more significant context than the activities of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House consider allowing a debate, as I have suggested on several occasions during the past few weeks, on the position at Wapping? The Tory Members who support Murdoch and his newspapers would have the chance to explain why they support a man who has sacked 5,000 people and rid himself of the task of paying their redundancy pay. If the right hon. Gentleman will not allow such a narrow debate on Wapping, will he allow a more general debate on industrial relations, so that we can show the difference between the support for Murdoch and the treatment of the representative of the Transport and General Workers Union in this House who is not allowed two hours off during his working day to look after his trade union business?

Mr. Biffen: A number of people would enjoy a debate on Wapping, not least those who think that the behaviour on the trade union picket line is a clear sign that the unacceptable face of trade unionism has not yet been erased, and, what is more, who would like to reflect upon the motley crew who assemble as auxiliaries and subsidiaries, particularly at the weekend. They are a sign that rent-a-mob has not disappeared from ultra-Left politics. That is my contribution to the debate. All I can say is that its more expanded version, alas, cannot take place in the next week or two.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): I apologise to my right hon. Friend for having had to leave the Chamber to take an urgent message immediately after his initial statement, but is he aware that the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service will be producing a report on the Budget and the Finance Bill in time for the debate which is due to take place next week? However, it is inconvenient if it is announced that the Second Reading of the Finance Bill will take place on Monday, only to have that changed very much at the last moment. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not let that happen again.

Mr. Biffen: I express my gratitude for the first point that my right hon. Friend makes. It will be for the general enhancement of the debate that we have the observations of his Select Committee. As to his second point, I am sorry, but if that business has to move by a day, to have an extra day is less inconvenient than to be short of a day.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Has the Leader of the House seen the answer in today's Hansard which shows that the Government intend to abandon their moral responsibility towards the 11,500 ethnic minority in Hong Kong in terms of nationality, leaving them in a position where they will be citizens of one country with right of abode in another? When do the Government intend to bring the order providing for that disgraceful position before the House for debate?

Mr. Biffen: I have not seen that answer, but I shall consider the appropriate timing for such a debate through the usual channels; perhaps we shall then learn exactly how liberal is the immigration policy of the hon. Gentleman's party.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the four hon. Members who have been rising, provided that they make their questions brief.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Bearing in mind the fact that President Reagan yesterday made some important foreign policy statements as a prelude to the Tokyo summit, will my right hon. Friend try to find time for a foreign affairs debate before the summit, with special emphasis on the need to strengthen the Atlantic Alliance?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point. I am conscious that we have not had a wide-ranging foreign affairs debate outside the confines of the middle east, and I shall bear in mind through the usual channels the timing of such a debate.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Further to my right hon. Friend's answers to the hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) on NIREX, will he be a little more specific? Is he saying that the special development order relating to NIREX could be put before the House of Commons but not debated and that during the period before a debate on the special development order there might be a debate on the Select Committee's report? Is that the right interpretation of his answer to the hon. Member for Mossley Hill?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot add to what I said in response to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), but I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have an early debate on law and order and freedom of speech in Britain to examine the latest position of the Labour party's leadership, that Britain now has good law and order under the Government, and so that we can question its suggestion that we need to ask people to spend £25 billion on the Labour party's proposed programme? At the same time, could we look at the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. One question.

Mr. Greenway: —ILEA's efforts to force headmasters of London schools to have some papers but not others?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that in many parts of the House there is an interest in a fairly early debate on law and order. I cannot be that forthcoming, in view of the considerable pressure of Government business at this stage in the Session, but I take note of what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the battle against terrorism raises matters of fundamental ethical importance which should be debated, such as the use of special forces in counter-terror operations? Will he also accept that it is time that the Government grasped the nettle on the subject of the death penalty rather than leaving it to a free vote?

Mr. Biffen: I imagine that my hon. Friend would wish those considerations to be dealt with in the ambit of a law and order debate if one could be arranged.

Auxiliary Oiler Replenishment Vessels

3.59 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

The Ministry of Defence has now reached conclusions on the competition for the first two Auxiliary Oiler Replenishment vessels of the Fort class.

This is a new concept for a "one-stop" replenishment vessel capable of supporting front-line warships and defending itself. Under its policy of transferring more responsibility to industry the MOD invited firms to put in their own designs to meet the Navy's requirement and to procure the whole ship, including self-defence weapons and associated electronics.

Although a wide range of shipbuilders and other defence firms were invited to tender, designs were submitted by only two consortia, Harland and Wolff (in association with Yarrow shipbuilders and yard) and Swan Hunter (in association with British Aerospace-Marconi).

The tender submitted by Harland and Wolff was technically preferred by both the Ministry of Defence and external consultants, as well as offering earlier delivery and a keener price.

The Government have accordingly decided to award the contract for the design and build of the first ship of the class to Harland and Wolff.

The ship will be named the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Fort Victoria. Once the detailed design has been completed next year construction will begin at Belfast and the ship will enter service at about the end of the decade.

Throughout the tendering process the Government have insisted that the competition should be scrupulously fair, particularly as it involved a private sector and a public sector company. The Government appointed independent consultants, who have examined the Harland and Wolff consortium's bid and have advised that it is unsubsidised and comprehensively costed. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has today announced an additional financial discipline on Harland and Wolff plc in respect of AOR aimed at ensuring that any cost overrun will have a similar effect on Harland and Wolff as it would have on a private sector company.

To ensure commonality in naval service, future ships of the class will be built to the Harland and Wolff design, but the Ministry of Defence will allow other shipyards to compete to build follow-on ships.

The Government have decided that Swan Hunter should be given a preferential opportunity to bid for the second ship of the class. Later in the summer, the MOD will be offering Swan Hunter Shipbuilders the opportunity to confirm that it is ready to accept a contract for the second AOR, with construction to begin as soon as possible after negotiations are completed, probably in 1988. This will be on the basis that it will be to the same design as the first, and that the terms and conditions, cost and programme will be no less favourable to the MOD than those already available from the lead shipyard for a follow-on ship.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The right hon. Gentleman's statement will have extremely damaging consequences for Swan Hunter and for Tyneside. I am sure that he is aware of that. The decision will almost certainly cause the loss of 2,000 jobs, including the whole of the design team of the Swan Hunter company. Some people might say that this decision will put the company's future in jeopardy. Others might say that the decision is a breach, certainly of the understanding, if not the undertaking, that was given at the time when the Government privatised Swan Hunter. Frankly, the possibility of building the second vessel to the design of Harland and Wolff is no solution to the problem.

Is the Secretary of State satisfied that Harland and Wolff will be able to meet its full contractual obligations, especially on cost and delivery? What on earth is meant by the statement that there will be to ensure that any cost overrun

"an additional financial discipline on Harland and Wolff"

"will have a similar effect on Harland and Wolff"—

a company owned by the Government—

"as it would have on a private sector company."?

What on earth does that mean? At the end of the day, are the Government prepared to allow Harland and Wolff to go into liquidation?

The second vessel is no solution. What is meant by the statement:

"Swan Hunter should be given a preferential opportunity to bid for the second ship"?

Is that a preference over other bidders? Is it a preference over Harland and Wolff? How on earth can Swan Hunter build a ship to the design of Harland and Wolff, with all the repercussions and practical problems, and yet be given a preferential opportunity in that situation?

Can the Secretary of State at least guarantee—the statement is ominously silent on this—that Swan Hunter will get the order for the second type 23 frigate? That is the least that the Government can do after the shabby way in which they have treated the company which they privatised.

Mr. Younger: That is a most surprising response, and certainly not one that I expected. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman heard the statement that I made a moment ago.

I made it clear that the contract was won on price, delivery and the quality of the product offered by Harland and Wolff. Nevertheless, I have intervened to state that preference will be given to Swan Hunter shipbuilders for the building of the second of these ships provided that it can meet the price. The right hon. Gentleman asked what this preference means. It means just that. The second ship will be offered to Swan Hunter provided that it can build it at the price. It is unbelievable that the right hon. Gentleman should consider that that is bad news for Tyneside. It is extremely good news for the area. This is not a breach of any understanding. It is a positive step to help Swan Hunter at the same time as helping the defence budget.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether Harland and Wolff would meet the conditions. We expect it to do precisely that, and the contract will make it clear it must do so. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is today publishing the arrangements that he is making for the close monitoring of production at Harland and Wolff to ensure that that is so.

It is well known that the type 23 frigate, O2, is being evaluated by the Ministry of Defence. A bid has been put in by Swan Hunter, and although the final decision has not been taken, it is clear that Swan Hunter is in the running for it.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us on the Conservative Benches and, I suspect, many Opposition Members, admire the decision that he has made? It is a bold and difficult decision, made in a "cannot win" situation. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House that because of his decision the armed forces will be equipped with the best ships for the job, and that, hopefully, they will be delivered on time and relatively within cost?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. He is right in saying that any firm which was given the opportunity to build a large new vessel like this would find that its work force was extremely pleased. We will get two AORs of a very high standard and at a slightly earlier date than was originally hoped and that must be good news for the defence budget.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the decision which he has just announced is a recognition of the competitive efficiency of the Belfast firm and the value of the firm's work force? Will he emphasise the fact that employment in many other parts of the United Kingdom will flow from placing this contract with Harland and Wolff?

Mr. Younger: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on all the points that he has made. It was clear that in competition for the design of this vessel Harland and Wolff put in a very satisfactory design, and that is why it won the competition.

There is nothing unusual for one firm to be the lead yard for a particular type of vessel and for other firms to make the follow-on ships. In this case Harland and Wolff is the lead firm, and Swan Hunter, if it is successful in getting the second vessel—as we naturally hope it will be—will build the follow-on ship. There is nothing new about that, and I am surprised that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) did not know that.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): Does my right hon. Friend understand that there will continue to be concern on Tyneside until Swan Hunter is awarded the second contract?

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the competition was between two exceedingly good designs, and the fact that on this occasion the Navy has preferred the Harland and Wolff design is no reflection on the design capabilities and skill of the team of the privatised Swan Hunter yard?

Mr. Younger: Yes, I entirely accept what my right hon. Friend says. I also accept that there will be concern on Tyneside until Swan Hunter has assured for itself the order for the second AOR. Negotiations for the second AOR will be put in train very quickly so that a conclusion can be reached. Both the designs were good, but, as the customer, I must make it clear that the Harland and Wolff design was, for various reasons, undoubtedly better. It certainly provided an earlier delivery date and a keener price.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The decision is a catastrophe for Tyneside, where unemployment is higher than in Northern Ireland. Is the Secretary of State aware that it is difficult to see how the position of a nationalised yard can be compared with that of a private yard when, in the case of a private yard, the shareholders, including the executives of the yard, stand to lose everything and to pay the costs if they overrun? Its position is no way comparable to that of a nationalised yard.

Mr. Younger: I am surprised to find such a reasonable person as the hon. Gentleman using inappropriate language. If every shipyard that is given an order for £100 million worth of shipbuilding regards it as a catastrophe, there are plenty of other people who are looking for a catastrophe.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I thank my right hon. Friend for his guarantees over future preferences, but is he aware of exactly how disappointing his decision will be to those of us on Tyneside who supported the Swan Hunter bid? Is he also aware that one cannot count among that number those militant shop stewards who, during the last three weeks, irresponsibly led industrial action during the campaign to attract this order, and who have been responsible for leading a series of industrial disputes during the last few years, which has hardly helped Swan Hunter's reputation?

Mr. Younger: I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's question. I understand how disappointing it must be for everyone in Swan Hunter that the yard did not get the first of these two ships. However, I have explained, in what I hope is a reasonable way, why this was so. My hon. Friend made a telling point about the activities of some people who caused disruption at the yard. I hope the House will give the Government and my Department credit for the fact that we have bent over backwards to pay no attention to that by making it clear that we are prepared to give Swan Hunter the chance to build the second AOR.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The right hon. Gentleman's statement means that this is a black day for the shipbuilding communities in the Tyne area. If he wanted to be fair, why did he not award one contract to Harland and Wolff and one to Swan Hunter? In the short term it means many redundancies in the Tyne area. In the long term it will put in jeopardy shipbuilding in the Tyne area because of the impact that this decision will have on the design team at Swan Hunter. Even at this late stage will the right hon. Gentleman agree to place one contract with Harland and Wolff and the other with Swan Hunter? Will he also agree to hurry up the type 23 order, negotiations for which have been continuing for many months? If an order is not received in the very near future, hundreds, if not thousands, of additional unemployed men will be walking the streets in the Tyne area.

Mr. Younger: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I made my statement. He asked whether it would have been better to award the first contract to Harland and Wolff and the second to Swan Hunter. Subject to Swan Hunter being able to meet the conditions that I have outlined, that is precisely what I have done, and I am wondering why the hon. Gentleman is not pleased about it.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it not clear from the questions of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that neither of the two Opposition parties believes in fair competition? Is it not also clear from my right hon. Friend's statement that, quite properly, the Government have taken the greatest possible care in awarding this contract on the basis of design, price and delivery date?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It leads me to put what I said the other way round. If I had chosen to deny this contract to Harland and Wolff, with its better design and delivery date, and with every bit as good a price, I cannot imagine what the Opposition would have said about the competition principle.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I listened carefully to the Secretary of State's statement. It defies reason. Is he aware that he has almost certainly announced the closure of Swan Hunter and that his statement about the second AOR order will be seen to be as cynical as the promise that was made two years ago about the type 23 frigate, which has still not turned up? Swan Hunter must have fabrication work now. The Secretary of State has made no announcement about fabrication work for the yard. His statement will be seen as a betrayal of privatisation on Tyneside and as appeasement of terrorism in Ulster.

Mr. Younger: Again I am extremely surprised by the hon. Gentleman's question. I know that he is concerned about the future of the Swan Hunter shipyard. As this is an offer to the yard to submit a detailed consideration for a further vessel involving many man hours of work, I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not welcome it. I hope that his constituents will manage to persuade him that he is not acting in their interests.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the lesson for industry in the north-east is that work for which it tenders must be competitively priced? If Harland and Wolff's bid is as genuinely competitive as my right hon. Friend's advisers think it is, why are there no plans to privatise the yard?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The privatisation of Harland and Wolff is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. No doubt my hon. Friend will take the matter up with my right hon. Friend. I agree about the necessity for competitive pricing. In this case, the company which submitted the most competitive bid in all the circumstances won the competition. I should have thought that any other conclusion would not be acceptable to the House.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Does the Secretary of State accept that his statement shows how parlous is the state of the shipbuilding industry as a whole? That is why hon. Members are concerned about employment, and why they are competing across the Floor of the House for the available orders. I, as a Scottish Member of Parliament, do not exclude myself from that concern. The design order for the Yarrow yard is welcome to the Clyde, but will the Secretary of State say a little about the O3 and O4 of the type 23 frigate that have been promised? I understand that completion of tendering may be in June 1986. Is the Secretary of State able to give us an assurance about this, because it is important to the yards on the Clyde?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's question. He is right when he says that the state of shipbuilding is very difficult because of the very few orders that are available. However, it surprises me that, if its representatives are anything to go by, a yard that has been offered the chance of a major order does not think that that is good news. Many people in Scotland will find that very hard to understand. No decision has yet been taken about a further order for frigates, but I am well aware of the importance of that order.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people will want to congratulate him on a well-judged statement? Is he able to state the significance in scope and value to the Clyde of the Harland and Wolff order?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. There will be a considerable amount of work for the Clyde. My hon. Friend will have to ask Harland and Wolff for the breakdown of the work on the first of these two ships between other parts of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The right hon. Gentleman emphasised the upper Clyde in his last answer. Is he able to say anything about the lower Clyde vis-à-vis Ministry of Defence orders? May I remind him that Scott Lithgow, Kincaids and Ferguson-Ailsa are in a parlous condition over orders? Does he have any vestige of hope to offer to shipyard workers in my constituency?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am very well aware of the difficulties in his constituency and of his very great concern about those yards. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has the main responsibility for the shipbuilding industry, is actively studying that problem. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that, no doubt for good reasons, Scott Lithgow was invited to tender for this order but decided not to do so. Therefore, I cannot be of help on this occasion.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Leaving on one side the question of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) about whether Northern Ireland and Harland and Wolff deserve this order in view of the Loyalist activities in the last few weeks, will my right hon. Friend please publish the consultants' report, so that justice and fair play can be seen to have been done?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern that justice should be seen to have been done. As I said in my statement, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is today publishing his plans for a close monitoring of this contract. My hon. Friend's request that the report should be published will have to be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): There was bitter disappointment when Vosper Thornycroft did not get any orders on the previous occasion. Nevertheless, I congratulate John Parker and Harland and Wolff on winning this contract. Obviously it has been won on merit. This is in contradistinction to the decision of the Secretary of State's predecessor, who awarded the Tucano to Short Brothers, and not the PC9. May we be assured that the work force will support the Government's confidence in it. We look to that to happen. Nevertheless, I hope that Swan Hunter will accept the terms laid down by the Secretary of State today, which seem, on the evidence of previous contracts, to be in accord with recent Ministry of Defence practice.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for this decision, although I appreciate his disappointment about Vosper Thornycroft. However, as he will know, that firm did not tender for this order. The hon. Gentleman should speak to his hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), because the Liberal party seems to have two totally different views on this contract.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): In welcoming the fullest information that has now been promised, may I ask whether it is not clear that this decision has been based on price and design and the needs of the Royal Navy? Has the attitude of the Labour party not revealed a bigoted hostility to Northern Ireland, which will be noted by the workers of Belfast?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said, and I realise that hon. Members will have many other factors in mind in considering the statement. He is right in pointing out that unless those who win a competition in a perfectly fair and normal way are given the contract, the whole policy of competition will fall down. In this case there was a clear winner, but, from the point of view of the needs of the Royal Navy, we have thought it best to put the second vessel to the other yard so that the best results can be obtained for the Royal Navy from these contracts.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Secretary of State accept that if one yard with a back-up subsidy of £37 million competes with other yards with no such back-up subsidy, that is not only unfair, but, if continued, will result in the closure of English and Scottish yards? If that happens, will that not defeat the whole of the Government's thrust for greater competition and their procurement policy? In addition, before the end of the day, will the Minister ask a favour from the Irish? As many companies in Great Britain have to watch foreign companies grow fat on hidden subsidies, will he ask Harland and Wolff how it has managed to hoodwink his officials, because surely the lesson could be more widely spread?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern, but I should make it clear that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has taken the greatest care about this matter. He will not merely watch progress. He is today publishing the ways in which he will ensure that the progress of this contract with Harland and Wolff is absolutely as per the contract. When it comes to the difficulties of comparing nationalised industries with others, the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that that is one of the consequences of having nationalised industries, which cause great difficulty in many ways which we would be better to avoid.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): My right hon. Friend would rightly have been properly condemned had he not chosen the design that is technically better and the bid that promised earlier delivery at a lower price. Will he ensure that if Harland and Wolff goes over budget, it will mean that the income of the management of Harland and Wolff is commensurately reduced, as it would be if the Swan Hunter bid went over?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right about that. This is a matter that the House and the Government will want to watch carefully. If Harland and Wolff were to overrun in the cost, that would reduce its ability to compete for further orders elsewhere. That fact will be a powerful incentive to the company, in addition to the measures that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be announcing today. My hon. Friend is perfectly correct in saying that to have given the contract to a company which did not win the competition would have been grossly unfair on all those who took part in the competition.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): While welcoming any contract announcement of this kind, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he is aware of the hundreds of subcontractors involved in these contracts who will be very disappointed that Swan Hunter did not get the design part for the second vessel? In my own constituency of Hull, one of the subcontractors is Humber Electrical Ltd., which makes marine switch gear and which will be particularly disappointed to learn that it is unlikely to get work on the first ship. This is particularly disappointing in Hull, where there is an enormous increase in unemployment and a lot of deprivation. When it comes to the allocation of further subcontracts by Harland and Wolff, will the Secretary of State consider Humber Electrical Ltd.?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point, but a lot of work is coming outwith Northern Ireland, even with the first of these ships, because subcontractors has taken place already. I understand that about a third of the work is sub-contracted elsewhere in Britain. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be able to take part in the second AOR. If they want to put in bids now to the main contractor for the first AOR, they will be considered, if there is still space. However, the point is that if subcontractors and contractors enter a competition, they must expect those who win the competition to get the work.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those of us who had applauded the management buy-out of Swan Hunter had very much hoped that it would be able, in fair competition to win the order for the first AOR, which carries the design facility with it? Can he be more specific about how soon Swan Hunter can expect the decision on the second AOR and, also on 02, 03 and 04 of the type 23 frigate?

Mr. Younger: It was disappointing that Swan Hunter did not win the competition. The second of these ships was one of two for which both competitors tendered. Provided that Swan Hunter can satisfy the Ministry of Defence that it will be able to produce the second ship at the price offered by the winner of the competition, it will be given the preferential chance of getting the second order. I hope that this will be seen to be fair to Swan Hunter, but it will require it to take some hard decisions in order to get its bid down to the right price.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people will say that if this Government and the Ministry of Defence had been as unco-operative as some of the leaders in Northern Ireland, Harland and Wolff would not have got the order? I am glad that it did get the order, and I hope that the leaders in Northern Ireland appreciate that fact.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. Perhaps I can assure him, and everyone in Northern Ireland, that in considering the bid I had in mind only the excellence of the design and the proposed workmanship, price and delivery offered by Harland and Wolff. No political consideration of the Northern Ireland situation came into the matter.

Land Rover-Leyland

Mr. Speaker: I call the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order later.

Mr. Nellist: It is on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has not been rising to ask a question, but I shall take his point of order.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to seek this afternoon to make a statement on British Leyland which, I understand, is to make no mention of the fact that on Monday this week part of the British Leyland truck and bus operations, Self-Changing Gears in Coventry, was sold to Cummins Engine in America, and four days after that sale there is still no report to the House of Commons on that part of a British nationalised industry that has been privatised.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not certain that we can know what the Secretary of State will say.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

When I made my statement to the House on 25 March following the ending of the talks between BL and GM on the privatisation of the main Land Rover-Leyland businesses, I made it clear that BL would continue to study alterntive ways forward for all the businesses concerned. In the particular case of Land Rover and Freight Rover, BL asked for proposals to be made by 15 April. As the House is aware, four proposals were received. These were from Aveling Barford in respect of Land Rover and Range Rover; J. C. Bamford in respect of Land Rover, Range Rover and possibly Freight Rover; Lonrho in respect of Land Rover and Range Rover; Schroders, acting for a management and institutional consortium, for Land Rover, Range Rover and Freight Rover.

The BL board has carefully considered these proposals and has weighed them against the option of retaining Land Rover and Freight Rover within BL for a possible flotation or trade sale at a later date. The board has concluded, on both commercial and industrial grounds, that retention of the businesses within BL pending a later sale presents a more attractive option for BL than any of the bids which have been received. The board has therefore recommended to the Government that none of the bids be pursued and that the companies be retained within BL while preparations for future privatisation are made. The Government have accepted the board's recommendation.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Does the Secretary of State realise that this latest Government climbdown represents a humiliating and total reversal of their misguided policy to sell off the Austin Rover Group, Leyland Truck and Land Rover? Does he appreciate that, were it not for the exposure of the Government's furtive negotiations with General Motors and Ford and the forceful expressions of parliamentary—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith: Conservative Members may not like this, but they have to listen to it.

Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that, were it not for the forceful expressions of parliamentary and public opinion which forced the Government, especially the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is the leader of the Conservative party organisation, to get cold feet, the crucial remaining parts of the British motor vehicle industry would this day be under foreign ownership and control?

Should not the Secretary of State now apologise to the British Leyland Group for the damaging uncertainty, calculated in thousands of orders and tens of millions of pounds, which the Government have caused by their foolish actions? Is it not clear that the question of other bidders being considered for various parts of British Leyland was a blind in that, when General Motors and Ford ceased to be involved, the whole project collapsed?

Should not the Government end the remaining uncertainty which will be caused by references to a trade sale and a possible flotation, which puts the matter not so much on ice as on melting ice, and announce that between now and the next general election there will be no question of disposing of these British Leyland businesses? I ask the Secretary of State specifically whether the Government have any intention of resuming negotiations with General Motors and Ford before the next election. Will the right hon. Gentleman give a specific answer?

Does not this whole sorry episode, which goes back as far as August 1984 and which has today come to a partial —I hope a final — conclusion, demonstrate the total unfitness and incompetence of a series of Secretaries of State and of the Government as a whole to take on the serious responsibilities for British industry which were put upon them and which they have pitifully failed to discharge?

Mr. Channon: As usual, the right hon. and learned Gentleman grossly exaggerates the case he puts to the House. I strongly refute his allegations. I explained to the House on 25 March the exact procedures that the Government would follow after my statement and what would happen. We received four bids which British Leyland carefully considered. They were serious bids and were seriously considered. The Government seriously considered the recommendations by the BL board. I and the BL board believe that, commercially and industrially, the best future for this company will result from a flotation or trade sale in a year or two years' time when the company's financial situation is better than it is. That must be commercially, industrially and financially right, and I hope that the whole House welcomes it. I made GM's position clear in my statement of 25 March. Nothing has changed.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is very much aware of the substantial investment requirements of the BL group. Will he therefore give an assurance that those investment plans will be supported by the Government without reservation until we can step forward with privatisation?

Mr. Channon: The investment plans of the BL board will be considered in the context of the corporate plan in the normal way. I take note of my hon. Friend's views.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Surely the right hon. Gentleman is aware of the damage caused to BL, especially Freight Rover and Land Rover, by the uncertainty in the past three months—uncertainty which will continue indefinitely because of the right hon. Gentleman's statement that these parts of BL will be sold at some time in the future? What will the right hon. Gentleman do to compensate BL for that damage? Why will not the Government simply drop their pig-headed insistence on selling off the most profitable parts of BL and let the people who work at Freight Rover and Land Rover get on with the job of making and selling vehicles at a profit without constantly looking over their shoulders at what the Government are doing behind their backs?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is trying to say that uncertainty remains. The proposal to privatise these parts of British Leyland has been known for years. That is not new. There is no new uncertainty. There will now be a period of stability. I am certain that I am acting in the interests of the companies as a whole.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the hopes and fears aroused in my constituency since the end of January? Whereas the prospect of Land Rover's privatisation will be welcome, the failure to take up the management buy-out will be seen as a missed opportunity, uniquely consistent as it was with the Conservative party's manifesto and backed up by trade union investment.

Mr. Channon: Of course I understand my hon. Friend's views. Naturally, the management proposals were considered extremely carefully, but the BL board concluded that the management proposals, and the other bids, did not represent the best course in the company's commercial, industrial or financial interests. In view of that recommendation, which was strongly supported by the board, the Government felt it right to pursue this course.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Is not the scandal of this sorry affair the fact that foreign companies were able to see the advantage of investing in Britain which our Government were not able to see because of their short-term perspective? Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to look at the possibility of European collaboration in this matter, as recommended by his colleague, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) on 6 April in his article in The Observer?

Mr. Channon: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is complaining about foreign investment or welcoming it—I expect that it depends on the company about which we are talking. I am trying—I hope that the Opposition will not try to change the position—to remove the uncertainty. Therefore, I have nothing to add to my original statement—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a serious matter. It is not a laughing matter.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): Will my right hon. Friend comment on the assertion by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that the GM-BL talks were somehow furtive? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that demonstrates to those of us whose industry interest is long-standing rather than just developed and manufactured from nothing, that people knew perfectly well that these talks were taking place, including all the GM employees, because the company circulated information to them telling them exactly what was going on?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The hypocrisy, double-dealing and hopelessness of the general Opposition stance have been evident. Their behaviour throughout the talks has been absolutely disgraceful.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is it not clear from the previous Government statement that a nationalised company could be more efficient than a privatised one? Why cannot the same logic be applied to British Leyland? The logic of the right hon. Gentleman's statement is that the faster efficiency increases, the faster the companies will be privatised—thus continuing the damaging uncertainty.

Mr. Channon: The hon. Member talks as if privatisation in the motor industry was a bad thing. When he looks at the example of Jaguar, I should have thought that would have given him cause for reflection, in view of the excellent results of Jaguar and the beneficial results of privatisation.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us feel quite bewildered today, although obviously we should not, because on this issue more than once victory has been lost that could have been won? Is it not a farce and charade in that, if the House had let General Motors buy, the Government would have been willing to sell? The management and workers put forward a perfectly viable and sensible proposition which in my view would have achieved what we keep advocating—a wider share-owning democracy. Why is it that the workers and management are not fit to buy it? Are not the Government hoist upon their own petard in that, if they are not willing to sell BL, they must back it and they must back it to the full? Are the Government willing to put money into the new design and a new future, because if they do not put in a new design and a new future we shall be stuck with failure? Do we want success and are we going to back it?

Mr. Channon: I have no doubt that the future of Land Rover in the way that I have outlined will be a successful one. The forecasts for it, I think, are good. I think that the prospects for it in the next couple of years will be very good. I have already explained why I think that privatisation is a good thing in the long term. The Government had to decide what was the best commercial, industrial and financial prospects for the company. If I had thought that the management buy-out was, I would certainly have accepted it.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Secretary of State aware that the only part of British Leyland group that now has an immediate threat over its head is Leyland Bus? What is he going to do about it? Is he aware that morale throughout all the Leyland Bus plants has been totally undermined in the last months? Will he reverse his proposals to privatise?

Mr. Channon: No, but I share the hon. Member's concern about the future of Leyland Bus. I shall have to consider this matter with the board in the fairly near future because it is a serious situation and there are difficult choices to be made in the bus industry. I know very well the hon. Member's concern about this, and I shall certainly bear it in mind.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Will my right hon. Friend accept that some of us do not necessarily have a great deal of confidence in the present BL board? We feel that, had it looked closely at the management buy-out, it would have been abundantly obvious that it has the resources and the backing of the trade unions and the merchant banks that would ensure that Land Rover and Freight Rover could continue successfully. Can I have an assurance from him that, in the event of a future sale of Land Rover and Freight Rover, it will be privatised and not sold to another company or organisation?

Mr. Channon: I understand my hon. Friend's view about the management buy-out. Of course, if that had proved to be the one that was the most likely to lead to the industrial and commercial success of the company, that would have been a respectable solution, and one that the Government would have been very happy to take. It would have been a very good solution for the company if it had been the best commercial one, but it was the view of the BL board that this was not the best solution. I think that it was quite right for the Government to take the course that they have. I have said that we hope to prepare the company for privatisation in future. I think that it would be wrong for me at this stage to close any of the options, but I note my hon. Friend's strong views that the better way would be to have a flotation.

Mr. Gregor MacKenzie (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Are we to understand from the Secretary of State's answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), that what he now proposes to do is to invest further sums of the taxpayers' money in the organisation and that, once improvements have been effected by this investment, he proposes to sell it off to the private sector at a very considerable cost to the ratepayer? That is what it sounded like to us.

Mr. Channon: No, I am glad to tell the right hon. Gentleman that that is not the case. There are no proposals from the BL board for further injection of equity into the Land Rover business.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people who very enthusiastically support the return of as much as possible of British Leyland to the private sector as quickly as possible will be disappointed by his decision today? In many ways it is an incomprehensible decision when there were a number of good offers on the table. Is it because it has come from a lame duck board anyway? Will not this proposal leave uncertainty over the head of British Leyland, with nobody knowing who is going to own it for two or three years, however long it takes? That will be very bad for its commercial future.

Mr. Channon: With respect, I cannot agree with my hon. Friend about that. What I am sure he agrees with me about is the need to provide the best future for the company. The BL board has made a very firm recommendation that retention of the businesses for the time being within BL represents the better commercial solution for that company in the long run and for the employment prospects for those in it. In those circumstances, I think that it was right for me to recommend to the House that that should be accepted.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Having created the instability the Minister now talks of stability for the company, yet he is still leaving the company in limbo. Given that the management has hanging over it the real threat that in two years' time the company could be privatised, does he not agree that what is needed is the withdrawal of that threat, to allow the company to get on with it and to make the investment available to it so that it can begin a strong marketing policy and sales can begin to boom again?

Mr. Channon: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. It has been known for a long time that these companies were to be privatised. There is nothing new in that. There is no new uncertainty about that. I believe that my decision today will remove the uncertainty. I think that it will lead to a period of stability.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my overriding interest and that of my constituents who work at Leyland Truck and Leyland Bus is that Leyland Truck is now first in the league of heavy truck manufacturers in the country and doing well, and Leyland Bus is considering offers for the purchase of that company? Will he confirm that the offers for Leyland Bus will still be considered on their merits, and take advice from those who understand the industry within and without as to at least one of those contenders? Will he also confirm that in the long term priority will be given to what I understand is a Conservative commitment to share ownership, directed particularly at the small shareholder and those working in the company?

Mr. Channon: I agree with a great deal of what my hon. Friend says. I confirm to him the position as he outlines it, of Leyland Bus. I am also glad to say, despite the great difficulties in the truck market, that Leyland Truck sales in the first quarter of this year are up by some 18 per cent. I think that is encouraging.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Have the Prime Minister and her Cabinet learnt any lesson from their somewhat unfortunate handling of these matters?

Mr. Channon: I think that what we have done is to arrive at a right conclusion, which I hope the House will support.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): While I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, in view of the huge overcapacity in trucks, vehicles and cars throughout the world, will he now produce an overall plan for the future of British Leyland, as piecemeal disposal will lead to more problems than it would solve?

Mr. Channon: As my hon. Friend knows, the new chairman of British Leyland will take over next week and, of course, he will want to consider all the options now available for the future of the company.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that people, certainly in the west midlands, will not forget the undercover and deceitful way in which negotiations went on without any public knowledge and, certainly, without any statement having been made to the House? Does not the Secretary of State recognise that what he has announced today is particularly a defeat for the Prime Minister—perhaps that is why she is not present — and those members of the Cabinet who took the decision purely because of party dogma and prejudice?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East

(Mr. Norris) pointed out a little while ago that the idea that this was some undercover or deceitful negotiation is absolute nonsense. It has been known in all the newspapers for months. The idea that some secret things were going on has, I think, been fully exploded. If anything has been deceitful, it is the conduct of some Opposition Members.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that arguing endlessly about ownership of the commercial vehicle industry does not alter the fact that people who work in the industry are concerned about investment and job security? Therefore, will the Government do all they can to make sure that General Motors stays here with a strong, viable presence? Will my right hon. Friend join me in refuting the argument of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that somehow the negotiations were furtive? Trade unionists in Bedfordshire told the right hon. and learned Gentleman about the negotiations months ago but he does not appear to have listened to what they said.

Mr. Channon: When it suits the Labour party to pretend that things are deceitful, it will do so. The House knows what value to put upon those words. As to the question of the commercial vehicle industry itself, my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the very serious problems that exist in the industry. I certainly share his views about the importance of GM continuing in Bedfordshire. It is well recognised in Bedfordshire and throughout the country that that has been an extremely valuable investment both in jobs and in opportunities for the country.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Is the Secretary of State aware that Ministers' wilful misconduct of the affairs of British Leyland has cost that company and the taxpayer millions of pounds for which, if those Ministers were local councillors, they would be surcharged? Is the Secretary of State not aware also that any suggestion that there can be a period of certainty is wholly undermined as long as he continues with the idea of a possible sale to General Motors? If he is concerned about the future of British Leyland, why does he not rule out completely a sale to General Motors?

Mr. Channon: I have already said to the House that nothing has changed with the position as regards General Motors since my statement of 25 March. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would be so good as to read what I said on 25 March, which was crystal clear and which the House accepted at the time. As to the question of uncertainty, I have a feeling that it suits some Opposition Members to try to create the uncertainty that they complain about.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is difficult for the House to evaluate properly what he has said because he has not told us what price the bidders have offered or what funds the bidders have to support the company in future? The interest of the taxpayer and of the employees of BL is that the business should be sold for a good price to purchasers who are able to fund investment in it in future.

Mr. Channon: I agree with the latter half of my hon. Friend's question. As to the first part, I am not in a position to reveal all the commercial details that were given in confidence to the BL board. It would be wrong for me to do so. I assure my hon. Friend that the decision of the Government, based on the recommendation of the BL board, was taken only after exhaustive examination of the commercial, financial and industrial implications.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Cannot the Secretary of State understand that this afternoon he has added to the uncertainty? Earlier he spoke of privatisation within a year or two. A little later he talked about privatisation in the near future. Will he not give a guarantee from the Dispatch Box now that there will be no attempt at privatisation until after the next election?

Mr. Channon: I am not prepared to give such a guarantee. I shall ask the new chairman of British Leyland to consider all the options available. [Interruption.] No. Hon. Gentlemen are deliberately trying to create the uncertainty of which they are accusing me. The new chairman of British Leyland will consider the future privatisation of Land Rover by flotation or by trade sale at an appropriate date, but that will be after a period of stability.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, because of all the millions that the taxpayers have put into British Leyland, it is wholly right that individual taxpayers should in due course have an opportunity to invest directly in a successful part of it? Does he agree further that the precedent of Jaguar demonstrates, contrary to what Opposition Members say, that far from creating uncertainty, the prospect of flotation may act as an additional incentive to both management and workers?

Mr. Channon: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. It is extraordinary that Opposition Members, faced with the Jaguar precedent, repeat the old-fashioned, out-of-date arguments against privatisation when it is clear that the privatised Jaguar company has been an outstanding success. What I think irks the Opposition is that it has been a success.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): Does the Secretary of State realise that he has added considerably to the uncertainty by refusing to answer the questions put to him by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)? He asked about the future of the Austin Rover division and about future discussions with American companies about the manufacture of motor cars in this country. Is the Secretary of State aware that in the period to which he has just referred, there have been continuing collaborative agreements with Honda of Japan which is now manufacturing to its specification? Does that not mean that creeping privatisation is taking place? Honda is making a creeping takeover. Unless the Secretary of State intervenes, before very long the Austin Rover division will be privatised by the Japanese and will not remain in British hands.

Mr. Channon: The statement was not about Austin Rover. The position of Austin Rover has not changed over the past few months; therefore, there was no need for me to make a statement to the House. The hon. Gentleman is inaccurate in what he has been saying. It had nothing to do with my statement this afternoon.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is not my right hon. Friend astonished at the attitude of the Opposition who for years have been trying to create the myth that our Prime Minister was bossy and would not listen? Today we have proof that the Prime Minister has listened to what Back Benchers have said. BL stays British, and we take things more slowly, which is sensible. Range Rover and Land Rover remain British. That is what the nation and most hon. Members want.

[Mr. Geoffrey Dickens]

Mr. Channon: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his robust support.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Government are totally committed to supporting the company's short and medium-term investment programme, which is so crucial to its future?

Mr. Channon: I have already answered that point. The Land Rover section of British Leyland does not need further equity. No application has been made to me by British Leyland and I see no reason why there should be one.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. Friend reassure the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) that privatisation is not a threat but an opportunity? If my right hon. Friend were a betting man, would he expect that opportunity to be put into effect before the next election or after it?

Mr. Channon: I have not been told the date of the next general election, so I think it would be unwise to take up my hon. Friend's offer of a bet. I agree entirely with him on the first part of his question. Privatisation, when it takes place, will be good for the companies, for the employees and for all the people concerned, and should be done at the moment when it makes best industrial and commercial sense. That is what we intend.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Does the Secretary of State accept that he has a responsibility to the House and to the company to come forward to the House at an early stage to explain what preparation for privatisation means? Will he consult the new chairman of the board of British Leyland as speedily as possible and come forward with clear proposals and clear strategy for the company so that we may avoid a confusion such as has arisen in recent times? As we all know, BL cannot survive in the volume car business without a partnership with another major company from another part of the world or from somewhere else in this country. Will he make clear what will happen and also why he has turned down the application for the purchase of the company by the staff and the work force of Land Rover?

Mr. Channon: On the last part of the question, I have tried to explain why the BL board does not think that the proposal put forward by Schroder on behalf of the management represented the best commercial opportunity for the company. That is why the proposal was not accepted. As to the first part of his question, I do not think that there is any need for me to make an immediate statement. There will be a period of stability, and the matters need careful study.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): In view of the unfortunate behaviour of Her Majesty's Government towards General Motors, and in view of the enormous investments which that company has made for many years in this country, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that no lasting damage has been done to relationships between the Government and General Motors?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that no lasting damage has been done. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the welcome that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members give to American investment in Britain and to investment by General Motors. If any hon. Member disagrees with that, perhaps he will say so.

Mr. John Smith: In the course of his answers the Secretary of State said that privatisation might be in a year or two, in the near future or after a period of stability. Can he tell the House how long the period of stability will last before the new instability commences? Can he not state clearly and confidently to the House that there will be a period of stability until the next general election, and that that stability will be achieved by the Government saying that there will be no change in the ownership of British Leyland? That will remove all speculation and uncertainty and allow the businesses to run.

Mr. Channon: As the House knows perfectly well, this statement deals only with Land Rover and not with the whole of British Leyland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is trying to widen the discussion to take in matters that we are not discussing. I am not prepared to give the undertaking that the right hon. and learned Gentleman seeks. I said in my statement:

"retention of the businesses within BL pending a later sale presents a more attractive option".

That is the option we will pursue and we will pursue it after we have carefully considered the situation with a new chairman. There is no hurry on this because we want to do it at the appropirate time. It is clear from the proposals of the BL board that it believes that in a period of time such a course of action will be more advantageous for the company than it is at present.

Oxford Street Bomb

5.1 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I will, with permission, make a statement about the explosion in Oxford street earlier today. At about 4.45 am this morning a small device exploded outside the side entrance of the British Airways office on the corner of Oxford street and Lumley street. The remains of the device are being examined by forensic experts.

The explosion damaged the office of British Airways, which is shared by some other travel companies, and it started a fire. The flats above and opposite the offices were evacuated. They suffered blast damage, but were not damaged by the fire. There has been some damage to glass in the surrounding buildings. One woman from the flats was taken to hospital suffering from shock, but has since been released. There have been no other injuries. Oxford street was closed for a time, but was re-opened to traffic at 10 am.

I understand that the Press Association received calls claiming responsibility from the Scottish National Liberation Army and the Angry Brigade but it is not possible at this stage to attribute responsibility to any individual or to any group.

Although the police issue warnings whenever there is evidence of a specific threat, the public should, as ever, remain on their guard and report to the police anything suspicious which attracts their attention.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is it not ironic that the Home Secretary is not present to make this statement because he is in The Hague attending a meeting about terrorism? May I offer our sympathy to those who have suffered loss as a result of this bomb attack, and especially to the woman who was injured? I congratulate the fire service on its swift and efficient action, especially in the light of the possibility of a second bomb. What additional resources are the Government making available to the police to shoulder extra burdens such as this, especially if there is to be any intensification of terrorist activity?

We in Her Majesty's Opposition condemn this new outrage and say quite plainly that the British people will not be intimidated by terrorist acts, as has been shown by the firm reaction to IRA activity. At the same time, the British people will not accept that they should gratuitously be exposed to terrorist activity. Will the hon. Gentleman now answer the question that the Home Secretary failed to answer when I put it to him on Tuesday: what advice did the Home Secretary give to the Prime Minister, in advance of the American bombing of Libya, about the internal security implications for Britain of those raids?

Mr. Shaw: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for offering his sympathy to the lady who was injured in this attack. Happily, she has now been released from hospital. Quite rightly, I take note of his strong views that we shall not be intimidated by terrorism. He asked about additional resources for the police. He will know that the Metropolitan police and the various specialist departments within the police have our full support about resources. He will also know that resource applications have recently been made by the Metropolitan police. Those applications are being considered.

The right hon. Gentleman paid special attention to my right hon. Friend's visit to The Hague. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will say how good it is that my right hon. Friend should currently be discussing with our European partners the improvement of anti-terrorist operations. I hope that the outcome of that meeting will be a strengthening of the attitude towards terrorism in general and Libyan terrorism in particular.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is my hon. Friend aware that we on this side are well content that he should make this statement? We are equally content that our right hon. Friend should be at this important meeting in The Hague. In response to what the Shadow Home Secretary said, may I ask my hon. Friend whether it is the case that there is nothing whatever to link the explosion in the early hours of this morning with any Arab organisation of any kind?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is quite right. Contrary to reports appearing in the press, neither we nor the police have any information that would firmly link this incident with a Libyan or any other group.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I join in the condemnation of this outrage by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and also the sympathy he expressed for the lady who was injured. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is his view that by far the best measure against terrorists within our shores is good police intelligence and constant vigilance by the police and the public? Is he satisfied with the level of police intelligence about terrorist groups that are formed and are situated within the shores of Great Britain?

Mr. Shaw: It would never be wise to say that one is satisfied with the level of intelligence that is available at any given time. I give the hon. and learned Gentleman my assurance and that of my right hon. Friend that the police, and especially the specialised departments that deal with terrorism, have real knowledge of what is going on in the United Kingdom. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will remember the events of last summer, which resulted in the interception of a major bombing campaign planned for resorts in the United Kingdom.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Is it not highly irresponsible for people to try to relate this or any of the other terrorist incidents that we have experienced over the past 10 years or more to the incident that took place recently in Libya? Will my right hon. Friend welcome the statement by the Shadow Home Secretary that we shall not be intimidated and the statement by the Leader of the Opposition during business questions that tourists should come to our country because it is far safer than most other countries? In welcoming those things, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that throughout East Anglia members of the Labour party are saying that our air show should be cancelled because we are frightened of what is happening? How can the Opposition square those two approaches to the same problem?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is right. There is certainly no question that the incidents of recent weeks should cause us to suggest that Britain is less safe than it was. My hon. Friend is equally right that, throughout the country, people should go about their normal business in their normal way. I ask, as the police would wish me to ask, that everybody should remain vigilant at this time.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): In view of disturbing reports that in the immediate aftermath of the tragic incident this morning a considerable number of armed United States marines were seen in Providence court in the vicinity of the explosion, can the Minister tell the House whether the United States Government have permission to maintain what is effectively a private army on the streets of London?

Mr. Shaw: Frankly, I find the observations by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) quite amazing. As far as I am aware, there is no connection between this incident — the relatively small size of which I have described to the House — and any of the hon. Gentleman's remarks about armed personnel or about the United States or anything else.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): What credence do the police place on the claims made by these so-called organisations? What credence do they attach to the claim made by the so-called Scottish National Liberation Army? Is that the same body which allegedly sent a postal bomb to the Secretary of State for Scotland recently? What are we doing to try to arrest these persons and put them behind bars?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is quite right; the organisation that claims responsibility for this incident also claims responsibility for the device which was sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. We will do everything possible to ensure that those guilty of offences of this kind are brought to the courts and, one hopes, convicted.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Can the Minister help to clear up the matter of definition? While I accept what he has said about the possibility of the connection — or possibly there is no connection — between what happened today and what happened last week, we have had some arguments about definition on the Public Order Bill recently. Can he define a terrorist act? I agree that the precise placing of this device this morning in a shop doorway, obviously with the knowledge of the perpetrators as to what damage would be caused, is a terrorist act. If that is so, how much more of a terrorist act is it actually to drop such devices from an aeroplane, which, no matter how sophisticated, cannot be as precise as placing a device in a doorway?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Member's question goes extremely wide of my statement. There is all the difference in the world between explosive devices, which try to trap individual citizens, and a Government who are seeking to impose terrorism as an act of policy. That is what the Libyan Government are seeking to do and it was in order to act against that that my right hon. Friend took the course she did.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington:) My hon. Friend said that, so far as he knows, the perpetrators of this latest outrage were not directed from Libya. Will he tell us what has happened to the 21 Libyans recently arrested?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is particularly wide.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): While the House is pleased to hear that there is no Libyan or other link to this latest bombing outrage, will the Minister investigate the possibility that the CIA may be involved in terrorist activity in this country?

Mr. Shaw: No, Sir.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Since only the White House or Israel could possibly welcome any renewed excuse for further attacks on Libya, will the right hon. Gentleman and his Department carefully consider the possibility of CIA involvement or Mossad involvement not only in this attack but in any other attacks that may occur?

Mr. Shaw: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's observations are sufficiently serious to be given further credence.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): Will my hon. Friend ignore the ridiculous allegations of the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds)? Will he accept that terrorism is international and that it will be combated only by international action? That is why it is quite right that our right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is in Europe today and not in this House.

Mr. Shaw: I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): While I appreciate that it is still early for my hon. Friend to assign blame for this scandal, will he take time to condemn the Labour party in my constituency, which since the Libyan outrage, since the bombing by the Americans of Libya, has said that Crawley is now a prime target for attack because of its proximity to Gatwick airport? Will he deplore such scaremongering?

Mr. Shaw: I do indeed. The United Kingdom is party to the policy of seeing that terrorist organisations are refused access to this country and that we bring people to justice, and suitably convict them of the offences with which they are charged. It is stupid for people to suggest that these activities make this country more or less at risk.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Can I press the Minister for a more specific response to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—the amount of consideration given by the Prime Minister to any representations made by the Home Secretary on the need for tighter security, prior to the permission being given for the Libyan raid? Did such consultation take place, and what note was given to that consultation by the Prime Minister, prior to giving permission?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In acknowledging that this act has been cowardly and despicable, has my hon. Friend looked at the situation for all airline offices throughout this country and the need for extra vigilance and more police at those particular offices, in view of the fact that in other countries, particularly in the middle east, there are bombing outrages on middle east airline offices?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will be aware that airlines, particularly those operating international routes, are fully conversant with the problems associated with terrorism, and are well aware of the various levels of tension, which cause them to make special arrangements.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR MONDAY 12 MAY

Members successful in the ballot were:
Mr. Malcolm Thornton.
Mr. Michael Fallon.
Sir Gerard Vaughan.

Orders of the Day

Housing and Planning Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered. Ordered,

That the Bill be considered in the following order, namely, new Clauses, new Schedules, Clauses 1 to 4, Schedule 1, Clauses 5 to 10, Schedule 2, Clauses 11 and 12, Schedule 3, Clauses 13 to 24, Schedule 4, Clause 25, Schedule 5, Clause 26, Clause 34, Schedule 6, Clause 35, Clause 27, Schedule 7, Clauses 28 to 33, Clause 36, Schedule 8, Clauses 37 to 40, Schedule 9.—[Mr. Kenneth Baker.]

New clause 11

PROPOSALS FOR CO-OPERATIVE MANAGEMENT OR OWNERSHIP

". After section 27 of the Housing Act 1985 insert—

"Proposals for co-operative management or ownership

27A. — (1) If a qualifying tenants' association serves written notice on the local housing authority—

(a) proposing that the authority should enter into a management agreement with the association with respect to dwelling-houses and other land specified in the notice, or

(b) offering to buy dwelling-houses and other land specified in the notice at a specified price, the authority shall take the proposal or offer into consideration.

(2) If the authority have not, at the end of the period of six months after service of the notice, entered into such an agreement or, as the case may be, accepted the offer, they shall give the association a written statement of the reasons why they have not done so.

(3) A tenants' association is a qualifying association for the purposes of this section if—

(a) it is a housing association of which at least half the members are tenants of dwelling-houses specified in the notice,

(b) it has at least 50 such members or is registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965, and

(c) at least half the tenants of the specified dwelling-houses are members of the association.".'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.15 pm

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 5—Financial assistance for tenants' organisations—

'In part IV Housing Act 1985 after section 107 there shall be inserted the following section—

"Duty to provide financial assistance for Tenants Organisations.

107A. — (1) A landlord authority shall from its Housing Revenue Account for the purposes of housing management provide financial assistance to tenants' organisations representing secure tenants in its area.

(2) The amount of grant payable to each tenants' organisation is an amount to be prescribed in Regulations calculated on a weekly basis by reference to the number of dwellings managed by the landlord authority in the area of that tenants' organisation.

(3) The Secretary of State shall by Regulations made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament:—

(a) prescribed the amount per dwelling to be provided in each grant,

(b) determine the criteria by which the landlord authority—

(i) shall distribute the grant loan and

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(ii) approve and register tenants' organisations in its area and

(c) specify the approved purposes for which such a grant may be spent.".'.

Government amendments Nos. 24 and 149.

Mr. Patten: On the 11 March, in our debate in Committee, I promised to bring forward an amendment to give tenants the right to request the setting up of a co-operative, and to place a duty in law on their landlord to consider that request, and give a reasoned response. This new clause fulfils that commitment.

The proposed clause will enable tenants to form themselves into tenant associations to meet the criteria provided for in the clause to put forward proposals either for the delegation of management of their housing association, or alternatively, its sale to the association.

I think I can reasonably claim that a consensus emerged during the Committee discussions.

Regardless of political party, we all wish to see tenants' co-operatives fostered. This is one of the ways in which to give tenants a real say in the management of their estates. By promoting management co-operatives, we provided for restrictions on the right to exchange in and out of such co-operatives.

Following concern expressed by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), I have considered further the terms of clause 6. I have tabled amendment No. 24 to limit the landlord's discretion for withholding consent to those cases where the prospective tenant is not willing to become a member of a co-operative.

The Government strongly favour giving tenants more real opportunities to have an effective say in the running of their estates, and new clause 11 provides the basis and mechanisms for the all important first steps in encouraging the formation of such co-operatives.

Amendment No. 149 provides for the clause to take effect on an appointed day. New clause 11 thus allows tenants to initiate proposals, and, more importantly, gives them the right to a reasoned response.

I have considerable sympathy for what the hon. Gentleman is seeking to achieve in new clause 5 which is to place a duty on local authorities to provide financial assistance for tenants' organisations. We know that for such organisations reasonable funding can make all the difference. I agree that local authorities should promote, encourage and support representative tenants' associations.

Consultation and tenant involvement in management can only be effective when there are active tenants' associations. Whatever good intent is behind the reason for this clause, it raises serious matters of policy and principle which we cannot ignore. The issue both of principle and practice is that which asks the question, "What local organisation could not do without a bit of financial help?" Surely it would be wrong to place a duty on local authorities to pay grants for amounts, and to bodies, not of their choosing.

Local authorities do not have a bottomless purse, whoever may be in control of them or of the central Government. They have to decide their priorities. They already have general powers and discretion to make payments to local groups in order to benefit the area. Under their discretionary powers under sections 111 and 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, they can fix amounts and criteria themselves.

New clause 5 seeks to provide that any grants would be provided from the housing revenue account. That would mean that all tenants would pay for the grants, but only those belonging to the tenants' association would get any benefit. There may be good reasons why some tenants do not wish to belong to an organisation. Under the new clause, they would be paying for something that they would not receive.

We discussed in Committee the fact that tenants' organisations vary greatly and will continue to do so. We welcome the increasing variety of tenants' organisations, because none of us would claim to know the golden mean according to which they should be set up. We are still on a learning curve. In many places, the semi-experimental aeroplane still has to take off. Organisations evolve to suit the needs, conditions and resources of their members. New clause 11 provides for the Secretary of State to specify how tenants' organisations should be constituted and organised if they are to qualify for local authority support. The criteria will have to vary to suit local situations. It is therefore necessary that local authorities should have discretion. In the light of those comments I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw new clause 5 and I hope that there will be support for new clause 11 and amendments Nos. 24 and 149.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I should like to dispel any doubts that the Minister may have about new clause 11 by giving it a wholehearted welcome. It is a first-class new clause and does not need qualifying in any way. It would be niggardly to say that it does not go as far as we want, because it is in effect designed to meet the attempts of the Opposition in Standing Committee to give tenants the right to trigger off a management co-operative or, in other words, take from their public landlord the control of their own housing.

The Minister said in Committee that we were going much too far too fast, and that the Government would consider an ameliorating measure to give tenants some legal authority to demand the setting up of a tenants' management co-operative and require the local authority to respond to that demand. The new clause is a foundation upon which all of us, including the tenants and the National Federation of Housing Co-operatives, can build. We shall watch closely what happens. My hon. Friends and, no doubt, many Government Members will actively ensure that tenants know about their new legal rights, and will make sure that we understand the reasons that authorities may give for turning down legitimate demands by tenants to get control of the management of all or part of their estates.

We applaud the measure. The Opposition do not carry the vote, so the new clause does not go as far as we would have wished. However, we will give the measure 100 per cent. support and do all that we can to make the clause a reality.

I accept what the Minister says about new clause 5. Unfortunately we were not able to discuss the matter in Committee and therefore we have not had the necessary background debate in respect of financial assistance for tenants' organisations. The Minister is quiet right. If new clause 11 is to mean something and to get off the ground, we need strong, well-motivated and well-resourced tenants' organisations. New clause 5 represents an attempt to raise that issue.

We shall not pursue the matter to a vote. We wanted the issue to be on the agenda so that the Government and their advisers and people outside could see that we consider that it is important. We shall return to the question on future housing legislation. I hope that the Minister will take on board the fact that we are serious about the matter. We were serious about our original proposals in Committee. We understand that our original suggestions about tenants' rights would not really work unless tenants were well resourced and well motivated, and that part of the resources would have to take the form of money.

Unfortunately, because of the financial implications, we had to raise the matter here rather than in the other place. However, we welcome new clause 11 wholeheartedly and we shall ensure that local authorities—whether under Tory, Labour, Liberal or Social Democratic control—are on the receiving end of demands from their tenants to activate their rights under the new clause. If local authorities turn down such demands, we shall want to know why.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The new clause seems to be worth while and far-reaching. However, as it is an important matter, will my hon. Friend explain precisely what will be involved? As I look at the clause with a non-legal eye, it appears to me that in a group of local authority tenants on a housing estate, if 50 or more such tenants, being at least half of the total, wished to join a qualifying tenants' association, that association could set up its own management, hire and put together its own management organisation and ask the local authority whether it could continue to be managed by the new management rather than the local authority. Alternatively, the tenants could go the whole hog, approach a financial institution, get the cash, ask the institution to back them, and buy, own and manage their own houses and community. Is that what the new clause means?

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I welcome new clause 11. To be frank, I would have preferred legislation giving tenants clear rights to trigger the opportunity of establishing a co-operative. However, I understand the arguments deployed by the Minister in Committee and realise that that might be too dramatic a leap at the moment. I echo what was said by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). I suspect that some local authorities of all political persuasions may be reluctant to encourage the development of housing co-operatives. It will then be up to those of us who believe passionately in the principle to bring our political muscle to bear on such authorities and try to make them see the importance of encouraging such development.

I also echo what has been said about the need to provide adequate resources. At lunchtime today, some of us had the opportunity to attend a reception in the other place on behalf of housing co-operatives. I talked to a number of rank and file activists who were involved in the development of housing co-operatives. I was struck by the degree of patience that is needed. One cannot simply declare a co-operative and expect everything to fall into place automatically. Some of the people to whom I spoke had spent two years or more in the formative process of developing a co-operative, understanding what is involved, and considering all the ramifications.

As was said in Committee, not just money but time, effort, and energy will have to be invested in encouraging co-operatives and enabling ordinary tenants to take on such responsibilities. The new clause does not go quite as far as I would have liked, but it is an important step along the road. I welcome it.

I also welcome what the Minister said about amendment No. 24. It involved a comparatively small point, but I am grateful to the Minister for accepting that, as drafted, the Bill appeared to run the risk of being unfair to some tenants. They might have been absorbed into some form of housing association and, as a result, have lost a reasonable right to transfer and exchange. I am grateful to the Minister for picking up that point and for dealing with it so fairly. I certainly support new clause 11 and amendment No. 24.

5.30 pm

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): Like other hon. Members, I welcome new clause 11. I was the chairman of the first improvement areas committee way back in the 1970s, when that concept was rightly put forward by the Government of the day. Improvement areas committees were set up within the designated areas. We gave them every encouragement and the exercise proved to be very worth while, as I hope and believe this one will be.

Those within an improvement area were enthusiastic. They elected their own chairman and secretary, and came up with ideas that the local authority thought about. I suspect that something similar will happen with tenants' associations. In the case of improvement areas, there was no financial support, or tag. We rightly depended on local effort and will and on local ideas. I believe that we got a very responsible organisation, just as I believe that this time there will be a responsible attitude from those who put in a lot of their own effort, give up their own time and incur perhaps some modest expenditure to be met out of their own pockets. The lack of a financial tag ensures that people use their own initiative instead of allowing the local authority to force something onto them using some financial inducement.

I hope that a tenants' association will not be used by either side as a political weapon, and that party politics will not come into it. I also hope that people will join an association because they believe in the area, in what needs doing in it and in what the local authority could help them to do. Any political interference would tend to undermine the authority and stature of a tenants' association.

I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Minister has given some thought to what would happen if there were owner-occupiers within the area. I think of the possibility of people who had bought their council houses becoming involved in whatever decisions or environment groups were suggested by the tenants' association. They would probably have more stake than anyone else in what was going on in the area. Both have considerable parts to play, but I believe that some thought should be given to the owner-occupiers.

With those few words, I give the new clause a warm welcome.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I have two brief comments to add to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). Hon. Members may remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) introduced the Right to Co-operate Bill under the ten minutes rule. Although the new clause is welcome it goes only half way down that road.

I echo the remarks of those hon. Members who have said that we shall need a right to co-operate. The view is still prevalent that co-operatives are not the best form of management. Recently, I had a long local involvement with a block of properties in my constituency. The block is over the bridge, in Cooper close, just off the Waterloo road. It was under GLC ownership, but ownership recently passed to Southwark council. Despite the goodwill and massive effort of the occupants, some resistance has so far thwarted the attempts of all the block's occupiers to become a co-operative. That has happened despite the fact that the block is ideally suited to such an arrangement. Until we have the right, local authorities will be able to say no, and to reserve the matter entirely to local authority management.

The new clause puts the pressure on, but falls short of achieving the aims of many people. The problem can be solved only by going down the rest of the road quickly.

New clause 5 concerns financial assistance for tenants' organisations. My one caveat about it is that there is a danger in suggesting that there should be a national standard for the amount of money to be provided. That matter should be determined locally. All hon. Members will agree that as non-political, representative bodies, tenants' associations should be able to flourish and prosper. They should be well run and should serve the community well, while at the same time counteracting the power of the landlord. Indeed, that is very necessary, as the landlord normally has all the cards and all the knowledge.

If central Government prescribe the proper amount, a danger arises. Local authority funds for housing should admit of an allocation for tenants' organisations and associations. I hope that we do not allow central Government to decide what should be permitted locally. That is my concern. I fear that the Labour party has a tendency to centralise everything. That tendency is still manifest, and I hope that it will be resisted.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): As someone who worked for a considerable number of years in the housing co-operative movement before being elected to the House, I warmly welcome new clause 11. It represents a major step in the right direction.

However, I take issue with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) over his remarks about the Labour party. My local authority of Islington has many management and ownership co-operatives. They are sponsored by the local authority, frequently in the face of carping criticism from local Social Democrats.

I hope and trust that the Government, and those local authorities that seize the opportunity afforded by new clause 11, will not see it as a cost-cutting or saving exercise. Unless sufficient resources are made available to housing co-operatives to allow them to manage and maintain their properties properly, and unless resources are sufficient to enable them to run as co-operatives—which is certainly no easy task for lay people—co-operatives may not achieve their potential. Consequently, I hope that the Government will not see the provision as a means of cutting expenditure but, rather, as a means of emancipating tenants and giving people the chance to exercise more control over their environment and their housing.

Mr. John Patten: Emancipating tenants and putting people first is exactly what the new clause is all about in this new world of subfusc politics, in which we are all involved.

The debates in Committee on tenants' co-operatives and the short debate today have shown Parliament at its best. Both sides of the House wish to improve the lot of one section of society. The Government have been prepared to go further than they had previously envisaged, but the Opposition have also recognised that although they would like to go further, there may be some sense in not going quite so far this time.

Opposition Members have given due notice that they may wish to go a lot further at a later stage. Indeed, the Government and I also wish to go further. However, we live in a difficult and evolutionary world. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken about the problems of setting up management co-operatives, about the practical difficulties and about the considerable personal commitment that is needed by those involved. We do not know where that evolutionary process will end. It could even end in the sort of thing that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) mentioned in his brief speech.

I think that new clause 11 and the associated amendments are a step on the way, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Marlow: If somebody wants to set up an organisation for co-operative management or ownership, and the local authority says that it does not want them to do so, even though it is manifestly the case that the majority of people who live in the community want it to go ahead, is there anything that they will be able to do under this arrangement? If not, is my hon. Friend considering bringing forward further amendments in the other place?

Mr. Patten: I recall that we had quite lengthy debates on that in Committee. I commend what I said during those debates. It will not be possible under this legislation to force a recalcitrant local authority to say yes. However, I am convinced that once the issue is on the political agenda it will be exceptionally difficult for a local authority to say no under any circumstances. I think that we have the balance right and I think that both sides of the House recognise that we have it right for 1986. That is not to say that in 1989, 1992 or whenever, some future Government might not think that we have to go much further in many directions, all of which have been referred to during this useful short debate. With those words, I commend the new clause and the associated amendments to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause 14

TRANSITIONAL

'(1) Until the end of the transitional period—

(a) no offence is committed under section 58H of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971; and

(b) no hazardous substances contravention notice may be issued, in relation to a hazardous substance which is on, under or over any land.

if at any time within the establishment period the substance was present on, under or over the land in a quantity not less in aggregate than the controlled quantity.

(2) Where a hazardous substance was present on, under or over any land at any time within the establishement period, hazardous substances consent may be claimed in respect of its presence.

(3) A claim shall be made in the prescribed form before the end of the transitional period and shall contain the prescribed information as to the presence of the substance during the establishment period.

(4) Subject to subsections (5) to (7) below, the hazardous substances authority shall be deemed to have granted any hazardous substances consent which is claimed under subsection (2) above.

(5) If at the commencement date notification in respect of the substance was required by Notification Regulations, hazardous substances consent is only to be deemed to be granted under this section if notification in respect of the substance was given before that date in accordance with those regulations.

(6) If at the commencement date such notification was not so required, hazardous substances consent is only to be deemed to be granted under this section if an aggregate quantity of the substance not less than the controlled quantity was present at any one time within the establishement period.

(7) If it appears to the hazardous substances authority that a claim for hazardous substances consent does not comply with subsection (3) above, it shall be their duty, before the end of the period of two weeks from their receipt of the claim,—

(a) to notify the claimant that in their opinion the claim is invalid; and

(b) to give him their reasons for that opinion.

(8) Hazardous substances consent which is deemed to be granted under this section is subject to the conditions that—

(a) the maximum aggregate quantity of the substance that may be present—

(i) on, under or over the land to which the claim relates;

(ii) on, under of over other land which is within 500 metres of it and controlled by the same person; or

(iii) in or on a structure controlled by the same person any part of which is within 500 metres of it, at any time shall not exceed the maximum establishment amount; and

(b) the substance shall be kept and used in the manner in which it was kept and used immediately before the commencement date.

(9) In this section—

"commencement date" means the date on which this Part of this Act comes into force;

"the establishment period" means the period of 6 months immediately preceding the commencement date;

"maximum established amount" means, in relation to any land—

(a) where before the commencement date there has been a notification in respect respect of a substance in accordance with Notification Regulations, the quantity notified or last notified before the commencement date;

(b) where such a notification was not so required, the maximum quantity which was present on, under or over the land at any one time within the establishment period;

"Notification Regulations" means the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 or any regulations amending or replacing them;

"the transitional period" means the period of 6 months beginning with the commencement date;

and other expressions have the same meanings as in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971.'.—[Mr. Tracey.]

Brought up, and read the First Time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government new clause 15 and Government amendments Nos. 73 and 82.

Mr. Tracey: New clause 14 would replace clause 20, which contains transitional provisions for the granting of hazardous substances consent in respect of land where hazardous substances are already being used. At the outset I should like to emphasise that the provisions of part IV are not intended to be confiscatory. Where a hazardous substance is lawfully being kept or used prior to the day on which these provisions come into force, it should, in principle, be allowed to continue to be kept or used in the same manner after that day. The Bill is intended to control new uses of such substances and increases in existing uses. Therefore, it is necessary to identify from the outset what is the entitlement of existing operators to keep or use any particular substance on their land. The function of clause 20 is to establish that initial entitlement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) suggested in Committee that the existing clause is inadequate in a number of respects, and similar points have been put to us by the Confederation of British Industry. We are grateful for the representations made by my hon. Friend and by the CBI. Clause 20 as it stands would require existing operators to apply for hazardous substances consent. If the application is refused, compensation would be payable.

This provision would impose a considerable burden on industry, which would have to make the case for retaining hazardous substances at each of the 2,000 or so sites where they are currently being kept or used. It would require hazardous substances authorities to consider whether to grant consent, which, in spite of the compensation provision, would inevitably open up questions about whether established uses of hazardous substances should be allowed to continue.

5.45 pm

I realise that there is an argument that authorities should be able to consider whether to discontinue the use of hazardous substances. The House will know, however, that local planning authorities already have power under section 51 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 to order the discontinuance of use subject to a liability to pay compensation. Hazardous substances authorities will have power under section 58(F) to revoke hazardous substances consent, similarly subject to a liability to pay compensation. Therefore, authorities already have general powers to reconsider any use of land involving the presence of a hazardous substance. They do not need the power to consider and refuse consent under clause 20 as it stands. To give them such a power would simply create uncertainty for industry.

It is because of those criticisms that we have introduced the new clause in place of clause 20. Under the new clause, existing operators will be able to claim entitlement to hazardous substances consent and, unless the claim is invalid, consent will be deemed to be granted when a claim is made. That will be a much simpler and more certain provision than the existing clause. I hope that it meets most of the points to which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South drew attention in committee.

I shall not detain the House by describing the new clause in great detail. It provides for a six-month period of grace during which claims may be made. The form of claim will be prescribed in regulations. Although the details of the regulations will require careful consideration, our intention is to require only straightforward factual information about matters such as the area of land and the quantity of the substance to which the claim relates and the manner in which the substance is kept or used.

Where the substance is notifiable to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982, consent will be deemed to be granted for the amount of substance last notified. In other cases, the consent will be deemed to be granted for the maximum amount that was present on the land in the six months preceding the commencement. In both cases the deemed consent will be subject to a condition that the substance shall be kept and used in the same manner as immediately before the commencement date. Those standard conditions, which are set out in subsection (8), are similar to those in the existing clause.

I said that I did not wish to detain the House. However, I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South and say how grateful we are to him for having raised this matter in Committee and for drawing our attention to the problems that are caused by clause 20. It has led us to reconsider the clause and come up with a proposal which is both simpler and less burdensome for operators and authorities alike.

Mr. Powley: I express my grateful thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister for the care and trouble that he has taken to meet the points that were raised by the CBI and myself. I am grateful for the new clause and for the more flexible attitude that has been taken to the problems that we outlined to him.

I have one slight reservation about the six-month period, which I hope my hon. Friend will take into account. He will be aware of the number of companies and the number of applications that will need to be made. One must consider the existing burden on the planning departments of many local authorities because of the other planning applications with which they have to deal and the pressure which they are under from those who make the applications. I hope that companies will make their applications within the period, but if some delays occur for administrative reasons, I hope that those circumstances will be taken into account and that firms will not be penalised for something which is no fault of their own.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

RIGHT TO RENT

'(1) Any person who has been registered on the housing waiting list of a local authority for more than one year shall have the right to occupy any vacant dwelling house owned by that authority which has been vacant and available for letting for a continuous period of at least six months.

(2) The first prospective occupier who gives notice in writing shall be regarded by the authority as the tenant of the dwelling house and shall be liable for such reasonable charges as the authority may determine.'.—[Mr. Rooker.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Rooker: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause gives to any person who is on a local authority housing waiting list for more than one year and who can find any vacant dwelling house owned by that authority which has been vacant and available for letting for a continuous period of at least six months the right to move in and make their home in that dwelling house. If necessary, those people will have to give notice in writing to the authority and pay such reasonable charges as the authority may determine for rent.

Throughout the proceedings on the Bill, the Opposition have not and will not move any amendment or new clause which we would not be prepared to move in government. That is a warning not to the Government but to those outside this House, the local authorities. We seriously intend to do something about the outrageous scandal of empty housing. That scandal transcends the local authorities. The new clause relates strictly to local authorities because of the necessary constraints of the Bill.

The last occasion when the matter was dealt with was in the necessary collection of information in April 1985. The information was supplied to me in a written answer on 19 December 1985. It revealed that, although local authorities at that time had 109,000 empty dwellings, there were still 500,000 empty houses in the private sector and there were 19,000 properties which were empty and were owned and controlled by the Government in the public sector.

The Audit Commission's latest report on the management of council housing contains a breakdown of the reasons why these properties are empty. The Opposition accept that there are many reasons for properties being empty — reasons of flexibility, movement, the need for demolition, and repair. However, in March 1984—the date used by the Audit Commission —there were a total of 113,000 empty dwellings. Of that figure 26,000 had been empty for more than a year. Of that 113,000, no fewer than 27,700 were actually available for letting on the local authorities' own admission. Of that 27,700, some 1,900 had been empty and available for letting for more than a year. That figure was not dreamt up by me, by a pressure group or by the Government. That figure appeared on the local authorities' returns for their housing investment allocation bids. That is the figure used by the Audit Commission.

The Audit Commission stresses that it is quite normal, when owner-occupied dwellings become empty, for someone to move out in the morning and someone else to move in that afternoon. That is a normal activity. As I said on Second Reading, it is scandalous that when local authority dwellings become empty someone must go into those dwellings to normalise them, which means that the previous tenants' improvements to the property are ripped out to make all the properties the same. The local authorities which practise that kind of management should know better and I hope that the Audit Commission will sort them out. Someone must sort them out, as the Government clearly are not doing that. I hope that the Audit Commission's proposals on that part of its report are taken seriously.

The Audit Commission modestly proposes that the re-let period should be no more than three weeks. We all know that the average period is a lot longer than that. There could be many improvements in management to help the process of re-letting and not all of those cost money. It is not simply a matter of finance, although I accept that in some areas and properties there is a problem about resources.

I cannot avoid the fact that there are so many properties available for letting. That is not my phrase, that is the phrase used by the local authorities. They say that 1,900 dwellings are available for letting and have been so for more than a year.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Rooker: The new clause makes it clear that tenants and applicants on the waiting list should have a right to property available for re-letting after six months. We could thereby end the period for which authorities keep empty property. I shall not name the authorities involved as we wish to make progress but I shall raise the matter. We all know which authorities are involved.

If the Government accept new clause 1, that would be a considerable step forward towards ending the scandal of empty properties. Having accepted new clause 1—as I hope the Government will—we could continue to deal with the empty properties owned by the Government and those in the private sector. The policy that keeps those properties empty prevents people from having homes. The Opposition want to make a start to correct that position and that is why I am moving new clause 1 in the hope that the House will approve it.

Mr. Marlow: I find the Opposition's new clause very attractive and it has been well argued. However, can the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) tell me what he means by "available for letting"? The hon. Gentleman gave various figures but it seems to me that there are many houses that could be available for letting which might not at present be defined as "available for letting". I would like to know what the hon. Gentleman's definition of "available for letting" is.

I would like to add a few more figures to those put forward by the hon. Gentleman. The Audit Commission's report is excellent and one of the best that I have seen on the subject. It states that the average period before a re-let in the shire districts is just under 10 weeks. That period in the metropolitan districts is about 13½ weeks and the period in inner London for some peculiar reason is more than four months.

Obviously, if the process of re-letting can be done relatively quickly in some parts of the country, for example in the metropolitan districts, why can it not be done more quickly in inner London? I am sure that the hon. Member for Perry Barr and the Government have addressed themselves to these questions.

Mr. Cartwright: I support the new clause. The way in which it was moved was a much-needed warning shot across the bows of the local authorities concerned. However, there are some obvious problems about the drafting of the new clause which must be resolved before it reaches the statute book.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) identified one of the problems. "Available for letting" is a term of art in terms of housing management. The difficulty in my constituency about many of the properties which stand empty for week after week and month after month is that when I investigate these cases I find that the properties are not technically "available for letting". These properties are awaiting a certain amount of redecoration or repair and are not available for letting in the local authority sense. Many of my constituents on the waiting list would happily move into those properties and carry out the decorating and repair work themselves if it were not for the restrictions that stop them doing so.

There is also a problem about allowing the first prospective occupier who puts his name forward to take the property. Although I do not like the bureaucratic rationing that flows from some local authority allocation policies, we must have some regard to family size and need. Simply to allow a single person or childless couple to take the first three-bedroomed house that becomes available is wrong and poses practical problems. We must address the problem of local authority bureaucracy.

Many of us have found that one of the difficulties is that there are so many different local authority departments involved in housing. A property might fall empty and the estate management team must then examine the property to find out what work needs doing. In my local authority, that means that the property must be referred to the department of architectural and engineering services, which examines the property again. If there is work to be done, that department refers the property to the works department to carry out the work. By that time the property has been empty for months and someone climbs into the property and vandalises it. The process of repair is then suspended for a year as there has been major destruction, fires and vandalism in the property. The result is that the authority must go out to tender for a major reconstruction job.

I endorse what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said. If the private sector can move so much more quickly to turn around empty property because the meter is ticking and it is losing money, why should the same approach not be applied to local government?

I endorse the aims of the new clause but I have some doubts about its terminology and language.

6 pm

Mr. Powley: I can see some practical and administrative difficulties in the new clause, and no doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will have something to say about that when he replies. The number of empty properties in any local authority has always caused me great anxiety. When I was chairman of a housing committee, I always tried to ensure that the number of empty properties was kept to a minimum.

I was staggered to find that at the end of last year Norwich city council had 652 empty council houses on its books. I am quoting the latest figures that have been made available to me. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) has put a period of six months in his new clause. Norwich city council's report of October 1984 shows that 156 properties had been empty for longer than six months. In March 1985 that had gone down a little to 120 properties, but by September 1985, the latest figure that I have, 170 properties had been empty in Norwich for longer than six months. That is a disgrace.

I can see that there will be some problems. As the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) rightly said—he has great experience, as I am sure do other hon. Members—it is exceedingly easy for any local authority to say that a property that has been empty for some considerable time is not ready for letting for some reason. The front door could easily be taken off, or the fuses taken out of the fuse box, so that the local authority could say that a property was uninhabitable, and it would be right. Unfortunately, some local authorities might seek by such means to prevent a dwelling from coming within the legislation.

I hope that the spirit of the new clause will engender the enthusiasm and the will to put empty properties back on to the market. I suspect that many hon. Members on both sides of the House will confirm from their experience in their surgeries that people who have been on the waiting list for a long time say that if only they could have a property they would do it up themselves at their own cost.

I shall listen to the arguments put forward by my hon. Friend the Minister, but that may be a way of getting that disgraceful number of 170 properties in Norwich back on to the market so that those who are in genuine housing need and have the will and ability to do the necessary work for themselves can be housed. That will ultimately benefit them and the rest of the local authority.

I give the new clause a warm welcome, but I am interested in the technical problems and I am sure that there are some that better minds than mine have thought of. With that proviso, I make those points in support of the new clause.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) referred to 176 empty properties. Since I was elected, my borough has had at all times about 4,000 empty properties, and that is from a housing stock of between 60,000 and 65,000. Despite the massive public awareness of the problem, the massive public pressure on the local authority to do something about it, and the massive repetition of the point which all hon. Members have made that week after week people say that they will do any necessary work, there has been bureaucratic resistance to letting go of the bureaucracy which impedes letting and reletting.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), whose sincerity I do not question, put forward a solution. I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) some scepticism. The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) and I, and possibly others, have introduced Bills to deal with the problem of empty property in the public and private sectors. There must be a mechanism whereby people can exercise the right, against the local authority that is compatible with their housing need and with their position on the housing list. This last requirement is necessary, because without it the position becomes anarchic.

The terrible problem at the moment — the hon. Member for Norwich referred to it in part—is that if there are a huge number of empty properties, for example, 4,000, with an annual loss of rent and rates of £6 million, as there is in my borough of Southwark, that leads to squatting and then legal proceedings are needed which eventually get people out, after which the properties are left in a terrible state. They are then promptly squatted again.

If the system worked on the basis, not as the hon. Member for Perry Barr said, but whereby there was an estate agency principle for those properties that are clearly hard to let—for example, the top floors of tower blocks in my constituency—flats on these floors could be let to nurses, medical students or students, for example from Guy's hospital or the Polytechnic of the South Bank or to young single people. They could go the housing office and see what was available, put in a bid and provided that they were on the list and priority when dealt with in a fair way, they would be entitled to take up that tenancy. They could either do the work later themselves, or the local authority could do it, but clearly they would not have to wait to take over the property until the series of different local council departmental responsibilities had been either in theory or in practice carried out.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr would probably accept that there is a technical difficulty about the first prospective occupier giving notice in writing. Clearly, that produces a sudden flurry of paper, and the first paper to land on a desk would entitle that person to the tenancy.

What is salutary about the clause is that it makes it clear that there is rarely any excuse—and less in the public than in the private sector—for keeping empty a public asset, destined for housing those in need and those who ask to be housed. But as the problem is more widespread in the private sector, where there are over 500,000 empty properties, we must address that too.

We should be able, through Parliament and local government, to deal with the problem in the public sector. As the hon. Member for Perry Barr and others well know, those who manage their housing stock badly, with massive amounts of empty properties, are more and more paying the penalty for that in simple electoral terms. Without going over the top, I predict that several seats will be lost by the controlling Labour group in Southwark to my colleagues next month, not least because of Labour's failure in Southwark to let empty properties to those in need. People cannot understand how any authority of any colour, which has a reputation and tradition of empty housing, is carrying out its housing duties and responsibilities.

I hope that this message will be well heeded and that local authorities of all colours, particularly the most culpable Labour authorities in London, will respond quickly. Otherwise, they will continue to be in great dereliction of their duties.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge, Brownhills): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) put fairly what most hon. Members on both sides of the House feel about the appalling mismanagement in certain cases of the allocation of council houses.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Audit Commission's report. That is a rather inspiring document, because there comes out of it some form of hope. The hon. Gentleman could have cited the fact that if the current national average relet period were to be reduced by two and a half weeks—the Audit Commission is of the opinion that that should be readily achievable by comparing the performance of the best 25 per cent. of authorities of all types with the rest—an additional 20,000 houses would immediately become available.

I know that it is easy enough wih every amendment that is tabled to say that there are insuperable difficulties or that the wording is not quite right and that the problem could be addressed in another way, but I urge my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know shares our anxiety about the large number of houses not immediately available for letting, to accept that there must be a way of tackling this. We look to the Minister in the hope that he is able to say that the Government will act to encourage councils, with much more force than they do at present, to make available houses for reletting more rapidly.

Mr. John Patten: This has been an interesting debate. I do not wish to harm the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) in any way, but I greatly admired what he said. He got the debate off to a cracking start.

We all agree that those responsible for public sector dwellings—local authorities or central Government—are doing a disservice to those who need homes by keeping such dwellings empty. I commend the hon. Member for Perry Barr, who gave a free-ranging, non-party political analysis of the situation.

We must approach the debate on two levels. The first is the scandal of empty public sector properties, which we all deplore. I shall not go on about it any more, as the problem has been illustrated all too clearly by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, by my hon. Friends and by the speeches of alliance Members. We must decide whether the new clause will help solve that particular problem.

If the hon. Member for Perry Barr and his hon. Friends, and the Members of the Liberal party and the SDP, are saying that we should isolate those councils which cannot manage their own stock and take some swift dirigiste measures to ensure that their stocks are managed better, I find that, personally and politically, extremely appealing. Somewhere down the line one must draw the line on inept and hopeless management. Exactly how one does that is the problem.

Because of my centralising tendencies, I should like to do something much more vigorous about waste that harms society. I should like to do something much more radical about the scandal of empty public sector dwellings than we have done so far. I do not wish to be bureaucratic and boringly ministerial and say that there are many practical difficulties about the way in which the clause is drafted.

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman is going to.

Mr. Patten: Seven years in this place have given me sharper hearing than I used to have and, as the hon. Member for Perry Barr has just said, sotto voce, yes, I am going to.

I do not think that the clause would work, as it would be bad law. It is not our job in the House to pass bad laws in the pursuit of good ends. The new clause attempts to force the hands of councils to get something done. The clause refers to "any person" or "any vacant dwelling house". I am sure that no one in this House would intend that a single person should suddenly become the tenant of a four-bedroomed house and the needs of a married couple, with three children, who have been on the waiting list for 10 years, should be overtaken. Who is to say when an empty dwelling which is to be occupied should become available for letting? There are considerable problems of definition.

How would the person on the waiting list stake his claim? The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) had some interesting thoughts on how claims might be staked, and I shall certainly consider them, but how can such claims be dealt with ahead of people who have been on the waiting list for years?

The clause as drafted would introduce a random element of legalised squatting, and I do not think that that is the right way to ensure that local authorities act with determination to get rid of voids. The Government have made clear their concern about empty public sector dwellings. In July 1985 the Government sent a circular to all local authorities on how to manage their stocks better. Good local authorities of all political colours have followed that advice and are managing their stocks better. When local authorities fail to do so, it is due to a lack of political will, managerial incompetence or a combination of the two.

I do not believe that the new clause will help to solve the problem, and in some ways it could make certain problems worse. I entirely applaud the spirit in which the hon. Member for Perry Barr moved the new clause. I also appreciate the thought which my hon. Friends and hon. Members of the alliance parties have given to the matter. Alas, for reasons that I have given, I do not feel that we can accept the new clause. The all-party message is clear to those councils which keep empty flats and houses.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend consider the possibility of bringing forward amendments in another place to bring about some of the intentions which have been mentioned in the House this evening?

Mr. Patten: I had not given way but had, in fact, finished my peroration—on a rather elegant and forceful note. My hon. Friend has caught me out before like this, and I suppose that he will carry on catching me out in this way. I think that it would be difficult to draft any amendments within the framework of the Bill which would make homesteading, or legalised squatting—if that is what my hon. Friend means—possible.

6.15 pm

If my hon. Friend is asking me to go very much further in a root and branch reform of the way in which local councils address the problems of empty dwellings and for the Government to offer help or coercion to make sure that they are filled, that is a much bigger task than we could hope to achieve in the Bill at this stage. However, I am sure that all local councils are now on watch. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), now that I am finally about to sit down, will agree entirely with what I have said.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Surprise, surprise, I do not agree entirely with what the Minister has said. I find the Minister's approach to local government typical of the Government's approach. Either the local authority does as it should do, or as the Government think it should do, or the Government will interfere.

The Minister spoke about his centralising tendencies. I hope that the new clause, which has been tabled by the Labour party, will be the hallmark of our method, when we form a Labour Government, of dealing with the problems that are faced when local authorities do not manage their properties well or do not provide the standards that we expect.

The Labour party's approach is to give rights to residents, voters and tenants to demand action or to take action. The pressure would not come from Whitehall and Westminster under the syndrome of "Whitehall and Westminster know best", but legislation would be provided which would put the pressure the other way. Action could be taken through the ballot box, and by individuals and community groups of electors, tenants and residents, and in that way these things could and would be put right. The clause has been tabled on that basis. We are not giving people the right to jump the queue for the houses which are available for people in need. People would not be able to jump in and obtain houses available for letting in advance of their turn as suggested by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) but would obtain houses which had been standing empty for over six months.

There are 668,000 empty homes in Britain and 105,745 of the stock—2·4 per cent.—are local authority stock. The clause is concerned, not with all those properties standing empty, which include the vast majority available for letting, but with the percentage of that figure which have been empty for more than six months or perhaps for more than 12 months.

The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) discussed the record of Norwich, but it has a good record compared with many other local authorities. The number of empty houses in Norwich represents 2·7 per cent of its stock, which is below the national average, and it has only 50 properties which have been empty for more than a year. It is those 50 or 100—if one takes the six-month period which is included in the clause — with which the legislation would deal. It is those properties which stand empty unnecessarily, not those which are empty but available for letting, which we wish to give homeless people or those in housing need the right to occupy.

We do not want to give the impression that it is just the local authority sector which is at fault. In fact, 3·2 per cent. of the stock of housing associations is standing empty. According to the Department of the Environment's housing investment programme returns, the amount of privately rented stock that is standing empty is 0·6 per cent. The amount of privately owned property which is available for rent but which has been standing empty for a very long time is much greater than it is in the public rented sector.

Mr. John Patten: I do not seek to defend the Government's reputation, but housing associations purchase and refurbish housing stock for later occupancy by their tenants. The houses and flats which they purchase are caught up in those figures when they are being rehabilitated.

Mr. Roberts: I do not deny that fact, just as I hope that the Minister will not deny that the city of Manchester, which was referred to in the debate on 22 April, has 2,272 properties standing empty and available for letting and that 1,932 of the properties that were included in the figure that he vilified in our recent debate are in exactly the same position. They are void and awaiting demolition or modernisation. If we are to be fair to the housing associations, we must also be fair to the local authorities, including the city of Manchester.

According to the HIP returns, 6·1 per cent. of public sector property that is managed by the Property Services Agency is standing empty. It needs to get its house in order. There are many myths about empty property. If one does not know what lies behind the figures, one cannot understand them. That does not excuse the fact that many public sector properties are standing empty, although they could be occupied, and they would be occupied if this clause was included in the Bill. The clause is imperfect and could not be implemented as it stands, but I ask the Minister to examine it. He has been flexible on previous occasions. I hope that he will agree to introduce a clause in the other place that will deal with this problem.

There are 40,000 people in short-life housing schemes. Many local authority and housing association properties would be standing empty if local authorities and housing associations had not done something about it. They have implemented the effect of this clause, although it is not included in the Bill. Many progressive and radical local authorities and housing associations have repaired properties that were standing empty and let them on licence. The Audit Commission estimates that 20,000 additional dwellings could be brought into use if a clause of this kind were included in the Bill.

The Minister and the Government make much of the fact that empty properties are standing empty. They have every right to do so, but they do not have the right to say that, because properties are standing empty, that justifies their decision not to build new houses. The Opposition agree that it is a scandal that properties are standing empty unnecessarily. They agree that 20,000 properties should be brought into use. However, that is no justification for not building new council houses and modernising older council houses and making money available to deal with the housing crisis that faces this country.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 3

LEASEHOLD FLATS

'(1) The Secretary of State shall by regulation give effect to recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee of Inquiry on the Management of Privately Owned Blocks of Flats (the Nugee Report) and such other matters as are complementary thereto.

(2) The regulations referred to in the previous subsection shall attend to the following matters—

(a) landlord's name and address;
(b) service of notices;
(c) agents' accountability to the landlord and the use of a receiver and manager;
(d) appointment of managing agents and level of management fees;
(e) management by registered housing associations;
(f) application of minimum standards to blocks of flats;
(g) end of economic life of blocks of flats;
(h) service charges and sections 18 to 30 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985;
(i) reserve and sinking funds;
(j) insurance;
(k) variation of unsatisfactory leases;
(l) resolution of disputes;
(m) residents' associations;
(n) tenants collective rights of first refusal and right to buy.

(3) The regulations referred to in this section shall be brought into force within 12 months of the passing of this Act.'.—[Mr. Fraser.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

On Second Reading, the Opposition said that we would give every possible assistance to the Government in order to put into legislative form the recommendations of the Nugee committee on the management of leasehold flats. That remains our view. This clause is the last opportunity for the Government to accept our offer, although it would mean legislating by statutory instrument.

I realise that, since the new clause was originally conceived and put down for consideration in Committee, the Government have said that they will implement Nugee in primary legislation next Session. We welcome that statement and the fact that the Government say that they will go further than Nugee and enable leaseholders collectively to acquire the freehold of a block of flats, if the landlord neglects his responsibilities. So far, so good: there is no great disagreement.

However, the Opposition want even more than Nugee. It is important that leaseholders of flats should have the right to extend their leases in the same way as that right was given to leaseholders of houses under the Housing Subsidies Act 1967. Leaseholders of flats whose leases have 50 years or less to run find that they have a diminishing asset. It is difficult to obtain mortgages on such flats. That is not good either for individuals or for the state of the housing stock.

Secondly, we do not believe that the right collectively to acquire the freehold should depend upon neglect by the landlord. The 1967 Act did not say that a precondition of enfranchisement should be the behaviour of the landlord. Many good freeholders manage leasehold estates. Dulwich college in my constituency is one example. That has never been an argument against the right of enfranchisement. The enfranchisement principle ought to proceed rapidly into law for both flats and houses. We shall expedite the passage of the Bill in the next Session of Parliament, but we shall want it to go further than even Nugee or the Government's response.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I appreciate that the Minister will say that he does not like such major matters to be the subject of delegated legislation, and I sympathise with his view. However, he will appreciate that there is widespread concern about the matter. Since I introduced my Ten-minute Bill on this subject, I have received many letters from all over the country. People are absolutely desperate that the difficulties in which they find themselves should be quickly remedied by legislation.

I wish that the Government had taken note of the widespread feeling in the country. The Government support the Nugee report, but I hope that we can press them to go considerably further. Many leaseholders feel that the conditions are absolutely intolerable. The Government ought to have delayed this Bill a little longer in order to introduce the necessary measures to give effect to Nugee now, instead of making people wait for another year or more. Even at this late stage, I hope that the Government will say that they will consider what they can do and that, if necessary, they will introduce an amendment in another place. The Opposition would support such a move. As the will is there, why cannot the Government do it, even at this late hour?

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the new clause. The Nugee committee did a good job. It made a comprehensive list of recommendations. This sector has been considerably neglected. People have great difficulty in gaining control over either their long-term or their short-term destiny.

The Secretary of State's written answer to the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) provides a general outline of the Government's commitment to the recommendations of the Nugee report. Between now and the beginning of the next Session, I ask the Minister to examine whether some of the other recommendations can be included and whether the suggestions that this new clause contains can be taken on board. If it would be helpful, all parties could contribute to the discussion in the light of the recommendations and the Government's initial response. I am sure that the Minister wishes to maximise the impact of the legislation next year for the good of those in the private sector who will benefit enormously if Nugee, or even Nugee-plus, is implemented within a year from now.

Mr. John Patten: I am in some difficulty over this new clause. I applaud its general drift and recognise that it reflects an all-party feeling that something must be done as quickly as possible for those in private leasehold blocks of flats.

However, I believe it is right that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Norwood (Mr. John Fraser) should remind us that there are good landlords and managing agents who do a good job. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. When he made his generous offer on behalf of the Labour Party, yesterday during Question Time, to assist with the passage of the Nugee recommendations through legislation, I thanked him for his offer of collaboration. I hope that was an uncharacteristic slip of the tongue; I meant to thank him for his co-operation. I do not suspect the hon. Gentleman ever of wishing to collaborate with the Conservative party.

6.30 pm

I was in the House to hear the speech that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubbs) made on his ten-minute Bill. It is clear that members of the alliance and the Labour party and on this side of the House want to do something, but unfortunately a lot of detailed work must be done. I am not being bureaucratic or ministerial about this; I simply do not believe that putting Nugee-plus into effect in the way suggested will produce anything like good law; it will produce hopeless and muddled law. We must discuss the detail of some of these proposals much more with the interested parties. For example, the proposal to appoint a receiver and manager for the operation of the right of first refusal and the variation of defective leases raise intricate issues indeed that require careful drafting.

Other points raised by the Nugee committee's report touch on matters outside the direct sphere of housing and my responsibilities. For example, the setting up of trust funds and sinking funds to deal with service charges raises complicated and difficult issues, as does the issue of insurance for these large blocks of flats. Many of the issues have implications for the rights and duties of landlord and tenant respectively, and they actually involve major changes to the landlord and tenant law. On some of the items listed as matters to be included in the regulations in the new clause—for example, the treatment of blocks of flats at the end of their economic life — the Nugee committee made no specific recommendations, except to tell the Government to do something, but not how to do it. Until further work has been done, it is not possible to determine how far it will be practicable or desirable to implement the proposals by means of secondary legislation, which I do not believe would do the job well. Indeed, there is a risk that the enabling power would turn out to be inadequate to achieve what is needed.

Recognising as I do the urgency of the situation, and the all-party will in the House to do something as quickly as possible, I think that this is the right way to do it. I wish that we could introduce legislation this Session but, without anticipating the Queen's Speech, I fear that we will not be able to do so. I hope that we can do something as soon as possible.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 6

REPEAL OF SECTION 2 OF THE REDUNDANT CHURCHES AND OTHER RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS ACT

'Section 2 of the Redundant Churches and other Religious Buildings Act 1969 shall be repealed.'—[Mr. Freeman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 98, in schedule 6, page 118, line 5, at end insert—

'(2A) Section 56(1)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 shall cease to have effect.'.

Mr. Freeman: I am conscious that we are now moving to a debate not about people's houses and their right to leaseholds or freeholds, but rather about the issue of the preservation of churches of outstanding architectural merit. Although this is a different subject, I do not believe that it is in any way less important than the other issues that we have been debating this afternoon. My new clause repeals section 2 of the Redundant Churches and Other Religious Buildings Act 1969. Since 1969, that provision has permitted the Anglican Church alone to demolish listed redundant churches without seeking listed building consent.

The Anglican Church is therefore in a unique position in relation to the other denominations. Having passed through all the excellent steps in the Pastoral Measure of 1983, which is currently in force, and having considered alternative uses for a church no longer in use, if the Church decides that the building should be demolished, irrespective of the fact that it is listed as a building of outstanding architectural merit, the Church alone has the right in the end to decide the fate of that building and, indeed, to demolish it.

The new clause is designed to correct that anomaly and, at the end of that excellent procedure contained in the pastoral measure of 1983, to give the Secretary of State for the Environment the right of veto over the proposed demolition of that redundant church. I point out that this procedure is already applied to secular buildings that are listed. If a building is listed, the owner of the building must seek listed building consent to demolish the building. The new clause puts the Anglican Church in exactly the same position not only as other church denominations but as other owners of private property.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I understand and appreciate what my hon. Friend has said, but does he not agree that in the event many more listed secular buildings are demolished, and there are much greater safeguards, although the ecclesiastical exemption operates, for Church of England buildings. Although I understand what he says in theory, does he not agree that in practice there are much greater safeguards for the ecclesiastical achitectural heritage items that he and I are anxious to conserve?

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but the short answer is that I do not agree with him. If he bears with me, I will come to his point in the logical sequence of my speech.

I emphasise what is not covered by the new clause. It does not affect the ecclesiastical exemption for alterations under the faculty jurisdiction procedure for churches in use. That is a wider issue and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) deals with it in amendment 98, which is grouped to be considered with this new clause. I am dealing with a narrower issue, concerned only with redundant Anglican churches. I am not suggesting in any way the scrapping of the Pastoral Measure provisions, which I believe have generally worked well. I ask for the ultimate right of veto for the Secretary of State, who would have the ultimate right to decide whether a listed redundant Anglican church should be demolished. After all, that was the recommendation of the Faculty Jurisdiction Commission's report in 1984 in sections 300 to 302.

I now come to my hon. Friend's intervention. Why is this new clause needed? In defending it, I will deal briefly with the five objections that could be made against it. The first is my hon. Friend's point that the Church system works better than the secular or state system. I disagree. I suggest no change to the pastoral measure provisions of the 1983 Act. I want to see all those steps taken—the church examining alternative uses, a waiting period, and consultation with local authorities, conservation bodies and other interested groups. I want all that procedure to stay intact.

What I suggest is a final additional stage. If the Church concludes that a building should be demolished—it has demolished 70 listed churches since 1969—I argue that the Secretary of State should have a right of final review. That is an additional safeguard; therefore, by definition more churches will be saved for the future. The new clause grafts on to an existing system one extra proviso. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) is satisfied with that answer.

The second objection, of which I am aware from my postbag and public comment, is that the Church needs money from the sale of land underneath a redundant church. The Anglican Church is hard pressed to obtain financial resources. By demolishing a church, especially in the inner city, it might lay its hands on valuable resources which could be used to meet its pressing needs —for example, to provide service to the community and to pay salaries, stipends and pensions to the clergy and their dependants. If a building is listed as being of architectural merit, wider issues are involved than the mere value of the land underneath it.

In a secular system we already apply the test that certain procedures must be followed before a building of outstanding architectural merit can be demolished. It is wrong to put the Church in a different category from the private sector. Without being sacrilegious, I point out that British Rail, which has a large number of buildings of outstanding architectural merit, must go through the same procedure. It, too, is hard pressed.

The Church owns about 50 per cent. of all grade 1 listed buildings. That is the size of the potential problem and a measure of the importance of the new clause.

Mr. Chapman: My hon. Friend has said that the Church owns a high proportion of the grade 1 listed buildings. Will he confirm that only one Church of England grade 1 listed building has ever been demolished?

Mr. Freeman: I can confirm that at least one such building has been demolished. That was a scandal, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing it to our attention. I am sure that he was referring to Holy Trinity church in Rugby. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who was then Secretary of State for the Environment, rightly objected to the proposed demolition of the grade 1 listed church and asked the Church to undertake a further review of alternative uses. Sadly, the Church decided to demolish that building, and that was a great loss to our architectural heritage.

The third objection is that, if the system is secularised, the Church's funding might be jeopardised or even withdrawn. The state already contributes about 60 per cent. of the resources of the redundant churches fund, so it is already an important and, perhaps, senior partner in the preservation of redundant churches. The counter-argument is that we are considering only an incremental burden—saving each year a few additional churches of outstanding architectural merit. That will present the redundant churches fund with an additional burden. I hope that the Anglican Church will not consider withdrawing its support. The excellent provisions of the Budget and the Finance Bill to encourage charitable giving by companies and individuals should benefit and enhance the resources of the redundant churches fund.

Fourthly, it is argued that the proposed new clause and, perhaps, the broader proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills are the thin end of the wedge in giving greater state control over the Church and are, perhaps, a step towards disestablishment. Since 1977, the state has been providing finance for the repair of churches. When the system was introduced nearly 10 years ago, a clear understanding was reached between the Church and the state that the state would provide finance for the repair of listed buildings and the financing of the redundant churches fund if the Church began the process of reforming its systems of building control and allowed the state, through the Secretary of State for the Environment, to exercise greater control and to contribute to reviewing the fate of some churches. That has been going on for 10 years—much slower than the pace of reform of parliamentary procedure—and there is little evidence of any action. I regret that. We are still waiting for action to be taken.

6.45 pm

The fifth argument against the new clause is that more building controls will impose a bigger financial burden on the Church. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) has advanced that argument, which is based on a misunderstanding. The listed building consent procedure does not mean blanket preservation. It means that someone other than the owner of the listed building —the Secretary of State—would encourage alternative use and ultimately make a judgment on the fate of the building. The Church should support that positive step.

This modest measure is supported by the Friends of Friendless Churches—I pay tribute to that organisation in promoting over many years the campaign for ecclesiastical exemption reform—by six conservation bodies, and by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Royal Town Planning Institute, the Association of District Councils, English Heritage, which is the public sector quango responsible for advising the Minister, and the Church's Faculty Jurisdiction Commission, which supported this move in 1984. I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) rightly said that my amendment No. 98 goes further than new clause 6. My measure is primarily intended to encourage my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to disclose the Government's thinking on the future of ecclesiastical exemption. The exemption, embodied in section 56(1)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, exempts those in charge of ecclesiastical buildings in use, of any denomination—a clear distinction from new clause 6—from the need to obtain listed building consent for their demolition, alteration or extension in such a way as to affect their character as buildings of special architectural or historic interest as would otherwise be necessary under section 55(1) of the Act.

The exemption has a long and inglorious history. Its origins were in the Ancient Monuments Consolidation and Amendment Act 1913, when the then Archbishop of Canterbury successfully persuaded the House of Lords that the Church of England should not be subject to the ancient monuments legislation, on the grounds that its own faculty jurisdiction provided the necessary safeguards. When the concept of listed buildings was introduced in 1947, and extended in 1968, the exemption was carried through into the historic buildings legislation.

The case against this exemption can be briefly stated. Ecclesiastical buildings are often the oldest, and in places the only, historic buildings in the community. They inspire great attention and interest in a wide range of people, not merely the worshippers. The law allows those in control of the buildings to make sweeping changes to them—even to demolish them, as long as part of the site remains "in ecclesiastical use"—without listed building consent and thus without the opportunities for public consultation and publicity to which such changes should properly be subject.

The exemption is based on a series of nonsenses. The first is that it was originally based on the controls that the Church of England has; yet exemption applies to all ecclesiastical buildings and not simply to those of the Church of England. Other denominations have no equivalent of the faculty system and yet enjoy the benefit of the exemption. Large numbers of nonconformist chapels and Catholic churches have been radically altered or demolished without any public participation.

The second is that the Church of England's faculty jurisdiction is in no way a proper substitute for listed building controls. It is sadly deficient in almost every particular. It does not properly involve the local authority. It gives no locus standi to non-menbers of the congregation whose church is to be altered. There is no mechanism for enforcement, and breaches are widespread. Against this, the churches and ecclesiastical organisations concerned argue that liturgical changes should not be subject to control by local authorities. Not all demolition, alteration and extension work is required for liturgical changes, however.

The Government themselves recognise the force of these criticisms, I know. In 1984, the Department of the Environment circulated a consultative document on the future of the extension.

At the same time the Church of England published the report of its own commission on the continuing care of churches and cathedrals, which advocated a number of changes to the faculty jurisdiction to overcome its faults, but left the system largely intact.

Almost two years have passed since the Department's consultative document, and the toll of ecclesiastical buildings continues. I think that the time is now right for the Government to make an announcement on the future of this outdated anomaly, and the amendment provides them with a suitable opportunity.

Mr. Simon Hughes: It is ludicrous that the provisions covering buildings of particular national importance across the board are dealt with in a way that can involve the public in a mechanism that gives them local protection but does not apply to the vast number—50 per cent., as the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) said—of the buildings that fall into the category. There was, as the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said, a historical precedent by which a protection was available before planning law developed after the war as it applied to churhces. Not only is that not truly a form of public law but in its procedures it is less effective, slower and less easily understood or participated in. I hope that the Minister can accept the amendment now or that he will find an early opportunity to introduce legislation so that this can be done soon.

The amendment is short and simple, and it would be a good starting point. It is about time that we protected ourselves against the losses that can easily occur of buildings that are part of our heritage, of whatever denomination or of no denomination. This can happen under the present legislation, and the amendment would prevent it.

Mr. Chapman: I have listened with care to the eloquence and expertise of my hon. Friends the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) and for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), and I have come to a different conclusion. I invite the House not to accept the amendment or the new clause.

I acknowledge that the law and regulations relating to ecclesiastical exemption are complicated and somewhat anomalous. Church of England churches in use, for example, and non-Church of England churches in use can be altered, extended or partially demolished without listed building consent. However, Church of England redundant churches require consent for alterations or extensions, although this is not required for total or partial demolition, if it is carried out in accordance with a scheme made under the Pastoral Measure. I accept that a non-Church of England church in use requires listed building consent for total demolition.

I wish to point out two matters that go wider. First, church buildings are now listed as, are all other buildings of architectural or historic interest, so that one has the same measuring rod whether a building is an ecclesiastical building of the Church of England or a secular building. Also, we are discussing a very narrow section of the planning laws related to listed building consent only. All Church of England buildings, indeed all church buildings, have no exemption from the normal planning controls.

Some statistics are worthy of recording in this short debate. The Church of England has 17,000 churches, of which a very high proportion, nearly 12,000, are listed. Over 2,600 of those churches are grade 1 listings. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering acknowledged that in the last 17 years at least, only one of those grade 1 listed chuches has been domolished. That is a very favourable record compared with the demolitions of secular buildings. In fact, the Church introduced provisions for the control of the demolition of buildings over 700 years ago. I therefore feel that I can say without fear of contradiction that the system has been tried and tested and, I think, has not been found wanting. It compares more than favourably with the control of listed buildings under the much later town and country planning legislation.

The Church of England spends about £55 million annually on the maintenance and upkeep of its ecclesiastical estate, and only about one tenth of that figure, about £5 million a year, is provided by the state. That is a pretty good record of voluntary contribution. The result is a proven record of success. While I know that one can adduce statistics to prove almost anything, I would abide by the simple point that a listed church of England building has a three times better chance of avoiding demolition than a listed secular building. I suggest that it is tempting providence to change the rules now.

In any case, I understand that discussions have been going on——

Mr. Rooker: Tempting providence?

Mr. Chapman: I thought that was a rather choice phrase. I always describe the recent terrible conflagration of York minster as an act of God. I think is is quite wrong that the state, let alone the Church Commissioners, did not take out insurance to prevent acts of God.

As I say, discussions between the Department of Environment and the Church Commissioners are under way. I remind the House that the existing arrangements have been regularly honed and in the last 15 years Parliament, on three separate occasions, examined these carefully and approved the present arrangements. As to redundant churches, of which there are just over 1,000, three quarters have been saved. Of the 266 that have been demolished since the Pastoral Measure of 1969, only 62 were listed. That is the latest figure that I have. I stand to be corrected although clearly there will not be much difference.

There are many more secular listed buildings — I think the total is about 338,000 currently listed, including the ecclesiastical ones. Last year alone, of those secular listed buildings 204 were demolished and permission was given for 2,372 to be partially demolished.

The Church, in my view, has an extremely good record. Opposition Members may think that it is a typical Conservative remark to say, "Leave well alone." In my view it would be in the interests of conservation and the protection of our wonderful ecclesiastical architectural heritage if we left the law exactly as it presently stands.

7 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts: The special pleading of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) was on behalf of the Church and perhaps not on behalf of the Creator, if He is up there looking down upon us. I am sure He has a real regard for the buildings in which we worship. The people who administer those buildings may not have the same regard for them. I accept the figures the hon. Gentleman gave. I suppose there has not been a major attack on church listed buildings since the days of Oliver Cromwell; he probably altered more than most. Since then the record has been reasonable.

Having listened to the amazing list from the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), I do not think we can treat the new clause lightly; it must be treated seriously. If there are organisations such as the Friends of Friendless Churches there is obviously a problem. I thought it was only animals that attracted such groups. If churches are at such risk that these organisations have to campaign for them, the new clause should be accepted. If the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet is right, and the Church does not want to demolish any empty listed church buildings, why should it object to the change?

I am not sure that amendment No. 98 is so sensible. I hope the Minister will clarify the point. That amendment would affect alterations within a church which was still being used for worship. I have had representations from the Catholic bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, who said:

> "Following the II Vatican Council (1962-1965) we have made significant changes in our worship; this has entailed significant changes in the universal law of our Church about the internal ordering of our churches. Changes have had to be made, but this is done after consultation and with care and discretion."

If a listed church is redundant, it should not be demolished without listed building consent. If it is to be converted into say, flats, planning permission should be sought for the change of use. If changes are to be made within a church for the purpose of worship, the provisions should remain as they are.

If money is available and if there is Government support, the real issue is to deal with listed buildings which have fallen into disrepair. There is one such church in my constituency, the parish church of St. James. The roof is falling in. It is like the Roman Catholic cathedral in Liverpool. But it is a listed building; it is a beautiful building and we are desperately trying to get money to repair it. Perhaps the Minister could help me on that as well.

Mr. Tracey: This has been an interesting ecclesiastical lagoon in the midst of what is primarily a housing and planning debate. I appreciate the sincerity of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) in moving new clause 6 and of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who tabled amendment No. 98. I understand their reasons. Certainly the Church of England alone does not have to seek listed building consent for the total demolition of a listed church or of an unlisted church in a conservation area, given that the demolition is taking place under the pastoral measure. If the demolition is by faculty, consent is sought in the usual way.

[Mr. Tracey]

The report of the Faculty Jurisdiction Commission recommended the modification or repeal of section 2, but that was rejected by the General Synod. It is fair to say that many people regret that. I am well aware of the depth of feeling which has manifested itself on both sides of the House and in the country at large.

The subject of ecclesiastical exemption from listed buildings control arouses much feeling. When the Department put out its consultation document in January 1984 on the future of the exemption there were 136 responses. Some argued fiercely for the retention of the exemption; others argued equally fiercely for its abolition, and others simply wanted various modifications. To some extent those views have been reflected in our short debate in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills, and then, suddenly, of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), who has considerable expertise in matters of architecture and conservation.

My hon. Friends know very well that my noble Friend the Minister of State, who has prime responsibility for the subject within the Department, has held discussions with representatives of the Church of England and the Churches Main Committee in an effort to find a way forward that would be acceptable to the churches, to the local authority associations and to the amenity societies. Those discussions have been going on for some time. We are getting to the point when they should perhaps draw to a conclusion; nevertheless they are continuing. My noble Friend still hopes that it will be possible to arrive at precisely the right, mutually acceptable solution. The speeches in the debate will be noted when the legislation goes to the other place. I remind my hon. Friends that not only will the Minister of State be there, but also the noble Lord, Lord Montagu, who is chairman of English Heritage.

Mr. Marlow: I am not sure how my hon. Friend intends to finish his speech. If he were to say that he would accept the amendment, that the debate with the Church will take account of the fact that the Bill has been amended and, if the Church does not like the amendment, that it may come forward with a different amendment in the other place, everybody would be satisfied. We would at least come to a conclusion on the matter.

Mr. Tracey: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend, but I am not galloping at such a speed. There is considerable expertise in the other place, including that of the bishops, as I think the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said from a sedentary position. We want debate to take place on the matter so that we may find a mutually acceptable solution.

The new clause and the amendment are somewhat premature. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise my sincerity and that he will seek to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Freeman: On the assumption that their Lordships will read carefully the Official Report of this debate, I do not wish to detain the House longer. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 8

DISPOSAL OF PUBLIC VACANT LAND

'All vacant, dormant, derelict and underutilised land in public ownership listed on the register held at the Department of Environment shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be Simplified Planning Zones.'.—[Mr. Steen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In a nutshell, the new clause is about waste. It is designed to help the Government in the objective, which they have put successively to the House and to the country, that derelict public land must be got rid of. It is not just derelict land that we must make better use of, but derelict public housing. On 1 April 1983 there were 305,000 houses which were difficult to let. One needs to reflect on the amount of waste in public housing. We have a great number of acres of public land that are not fully utilised.

It is worth mentioning by way of introduction an answer to a question in April 1984, two years ago. The junior Minister in the Department, who is still the junior Minister there, told me that there were 766,779 sq m of vacant office space in public ownership. That figure is so astronomical that it is difficult to comprehend. We have a great deal of land, we have housing and we have office space that is totally vacant and surplus to requirements and we should get rid of it.

The purpose of this new clause is to accelerate the sale of derelict, dormant, vacant and under-utilised land in public ownership. That means the ownership of land by Government, local government, health authorities, county authorities, district councils, water boards, the Coal Board, British Rail and electricity boards. The House knows the list; the amount of land is astronomical. We have had a number of debates about the scale fo the problem of vacant land. We have had a great number of Adjournment debates and questions and Ministers have always been helpful, but the House should know the scale of the present problem.

Some people say that 100,000 acres of public land are vacant, dormant and derelict while others say it is one third of a million acres. The figures may be academic, but, in order to get precise figures, a former Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), said in 1981 that there was no point in talking about one third of a million acres or 100,000 acres and that it would be better to have a register. I was not a great supporter of the register because it seemed to me to be another delaying tactic, but to give my right hon. Friend his due, he set up a register and in July 1982 it showed that 95,329 acres of public land were registered. In January 1983 that figure had risen to 107,612 acres. In July 1983 it went up again to 110,543 acres, and in January 1984 it rose yet again to 112,167 acres of vacant, dormant, derelict and under-utilised public land.

We know that a lot of vacant land is in public ownership and we also know that the amount of land on the register is only the tip of the iceberg. That is because there is no requirement to register land that is under one acre and a great deal of public, vacant, dormant and derelict land is under one acre. One does have to register land that is scheduled for use by a public authority within, I think, two years but it may have been reduced to one year. On 29

March 1984, there were 4,426 acres of unused and under-utilised land surplus to requirements in health authorities. Why should health authorities have 4,426 acres of publicly owned land that is not being used? Such land is a national, wasting asset and one that is not being used for the benefit of society. It is land that is hoarded by public health authorities.

It is not just the health authorities that are at fault. Let us look at the Department of Energy, a Government Department. It has 311 acres of vacant land. What is it doing with that land? Why has the Ministry of Defence got nearly 2,600 acres of vacant land surplus to requirements? Why is that land not being used? But if the Ministry of Defence hoards 2,600 acres what about British Rail? Although people say that British Rail is improving, two years ago it had nearly 15,000 acres surplus to requirements.

According to the figures that I have, on 1 January 1984, although British Rail had nearly 15,000 acres of vacant, dormant, derelict or under-utilised land, it disposed of only 1,000 acres. At that rate it will take 15 years to dispose of that land. I will not trouble the House by listing all the other public undertakings hoarding land that is vacant, dormant and derelict. However, I shall name a few of them. British Gas has 1,700 acres; the National Coal Board has 2,200 acres; the port authorities have 2,800 acres; the electricity boards have 3,600 acres; and the water authorities have 2,500 acres. So it continues.

The amount of vacant public land that is not being used is a national disgrace and a national, wasting asset. I have mentioned the land on the register, but I should like to give the estimates of the amount of public, vacant land that is unregistered. The well-known and eminent authority on land use, Miss Alice Coleman of King's College, London, estimates that one third of a million acres of public land is lying dormant. It is that one third of a million acres which this new clause aims to correct.

The purpose of the register was to provide a means by which the Secretary of State could direct the disposal of land hoarded by public authorities. That was why, in 1981, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley, set up the register procedure. He wanted to get the public authorities to put the land on the register and if they did not have good reasons for holding it, he could make orders for them to get rid of it.

It was mildly disappointing that in answer to a parliamentary question on 21 March 1984, over two years ago, a junior Minister advised me that no orders for disposal of the land had been made. That means that two years ago no orders had been made, and the number of acres of land on the register continued to rise. The Government have put that right, and when the Minister is replying to this short debate perhaps he will tell the House how many disposal orders have been made.

I understand that the figure on the register today is no longer 112,000 acres, the figure that it was a year ago. It is now 110,000 acres. I congratulate the Government on reducing the number of dormant, derelict and under-utilised acres of land on the register by 2,000. At this rate it will take about 50 years to get rid of all the public land on the register, but about 300 years to get rid of all the dormant and derelict land in public ownership, not to mention private ownership. By means of this new clause we seek to find a device to speed up the process by which this public, derelict land can be released.

As the House will know, the problem of public, derelict land is not a new one. The then Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) produced a White Paper, "Policy for the Inner Cities", in 1976-77, in which he highlighted the problem of derelict land. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that he would write to every nationalised industry and ask them to review their holdings. I am afraid his letter in 1978 did not produce any goodies, because by 1981 one could not see whether any land had been released. The nationalised industries may have reviewed their holdings, but nothing much happened.

The idea of the register was to focus attention on public authorities that were hoarding land, and was aimed at stimulating action. The House would like to hear from the Minister who is to reply what action is being taken, what action can be taken in future and what he feels about the time scale if it will take 40 or 50 years to release the publicly owned land that is on the register. The House, and I think all hon. Members, want to know why it is taking so long to release the land on the register, and what steps the Government will take to speed up the process. That is what the new clause is aiming to do. I think we must congratulate the Government in selling off the land and producing the orders, but it is all too slow and somewhat bureacratic.

Perhaps I could be excused if I mention the splendid book—which I am sure all hon. Members will have read—which I wrote about four years ago called "New Life in Old Cities". [Interruption.] I am grateful for the Minister saying that it was a good book. I will send him a complimentary copy because I am told that it is much better than Horlicks.

In that book, I suggested that the simplest way in which public vacant land could be released—I have asked many questions on this point since — is for the Government to auction it off to the highest bidder. It is an attractive idea. On the steps of the principal town halls of the country the mayor will be standing, wearing his chain saying, "What am I bid for this piece of land?" Why should it not go to the highest bidder, provided that there is a covenant that the land should be developed, shall we say in a year or two, so that if it is not developed it goes back into the auction market and to the private sector? At least it would get it moving.

I suggested, to avoid a flood of land on the market by way of auction, that the public authorities should decide on 25 per cent. of their land that is surplus to requirement, and sell part of it off every year, so that it will take four years to get rid of their surplus requirement. At the present moment, with the amount of land on the register, it would take 30, 40 or 50 years.

The Minister said on a number of occasions that the problem with the auction is the problem of negative land value. Let us avoid those sites which have negative land value, and just auction off the sites that do not, so that the amount of public vacant land on the register will be reduced.

The Minister would be well advised not just to look at local authorities — although I am critical of local authorities—but also at the nationalised industries, and, just as important, the old Government Departments. The Government cannot preach until they get their house in order. There is a lot of public land in Government ownership which should be released.

[Mr. Anthony Steen]

We have to give the Government due credit because they have embarked upon a number of important approaches to release public vacant land. The Government have a derelict land grant on reclamation projects, and I am told that Government spending is in excess of £75 million this year. There are about 71 acres involved in reclamation most years. There are enterprise zones, which have reclaimed land, and there are the new town corporations, the Merseyside and London Docklands Development Corporations through to the regeneration of the Chatham docks.

Perhaps most successful, there has been the urban development grant where £65 million of Government grant sparked off £295 million of private investment. Let it not be forgotten that this Government are the first to mobilise private money to reduce the amount of derelict land. There is the urban aid programme of some £300 million, and the joint public and private partnership. There is the Wavertree technology park, which has created some 2,000 jobs in the old marshalling yard in my former constituency.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley was right to say that if we put public money in, private money will follow, but there are other ways of doing it which are quicker and more enterprising.

I pass over inner-city enterprises, Operation Groundwork, the Liverpool garden festival, the new one in Stoke-on-Trent. In spite of all these wonderful initiatives, I still believe that there is one third of a million acres of land in public ownership which is vacant, dormant and derelict.

Let us look at the consequences, and why this new clause is of such significance. An artificial shortage of land in the primary urban areas actually creates a force for development beyond the city boundaries on the good agricultural land outside, on the green field sites, and pressure is put on the green belt. If these vacant sites in public ownership are left surplus to requirement in the inner city, developers have to look outside it to build houses to satisfy the market demands.

I want to give a specific example to the House to explain why this new clause has such relevance. In the city of Plymouth, which abuts my constituency, and is a large urban conurbation, the market forces, according to the city council, demand that it has a land bank of approximately five years' supply—around 250 acres, or 50 acres a year. Through good housing management, it managed to find this 250 acres. In 1980 it went to the Devon county council to talk about the structure plan and said, "If we look ahead, market forces will continue to demand more and more land for housing. We must go outside the city boundaries." That was included in the Devon structure plan for 1980. It was agreed that some 60 acres of prime agricultural land in my constituency of South Hams should be allowed to be built on, even though there were many many acres of dormant, derelict, public land within the Plymouth boundary. For example, there are some 200 acres belonging to the Ministry of Defence which is vacant, dormant and derelict. There is land belonging to the county education authority. There are many acres of land belonging to British Rail. What has happened is that the Devon structure plan includes green field sites and agricultural land outside the city boundary. If this clause is passed, the simplified planning zones will apply to public vacant land and allow the owners of the land to release the land much more easily.

I am pleading with the House this evening to agree to a clause that will enable our principal city areas to release their land much more easily. A simplified planning zone —which is the framework of this Bill—applied to this land would mean that instead of land outside the city boundaries being included in a structure plan—because there is a shortage of land inside the city—that land could be built on first.

My information is that in Plymouth's case it would mean that the land outside could be taken out of the structure plan, and land inside in public ownership, whether Ministry of Defence, or the British Rail 20-acre Friary site, or the land belonging to the education authority, or horticultural land on the outskirts, could be used rather than good agricultural land outside.

The Government have repeatedly said that public land must be sold off and that good agricultural land must be saved. They said that about the Okehampton bypass. They said "We must not go to the north of Okehampton, we must go south. We must go straight through the national park because is far better that we save the good agricultural land to the north." So too in Plymouth: they could use good derelict vacant land in the centre of Plymouth rather than go outside to use good agricultural land.

All this new clause is doing is easing the problems for the Government. It is easing the planning regime when it comes to public vacant land on the register. It helps the developer; it gives them extra encouragement, and the incentive to buy public wasting land.

This clause is about saving a national wasting asset. It will not solve all the problems, but it is a step in the right direction. It is another weapon in this Government's armoury in their battle to rebuild the inner cities and declining urban areas, and compel public authorities to stop hoarding land.

I pay tribute to the Minister and his Department for what they have done to date. There is more to be done and I hope that the aim of this evening's debate is to help accelerate the sale not just of the 112,000 acres on the register, but of the other 200,000 acres of public vacant land which is currently being hoarded all over the nation.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I hope that the Government are opposed to the new clause. The Opposition certainly are. It would have the interesting effect of declaring simplified planning areas in rural as well as inner-city areas. The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) must have realised that, but he may not have realised how it would anger those of his hon. Friends who are opposed to simplified planning zones in rural areas.

7.30 pm

We do not want a major debate on the hon. Gentleman's simplistic view of how to deal with vacant, dormant and under-utilised land. The new clause refers only to land in public ownership. I represent an inner-city area where there is a great deal of dormant, derelict and under-utilised land, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the reason why it is in that state—whether it is in public or in private ownership—is that no one wants to use it. The hon. Gentleman suggests that builders are forced to go into green belts or other land that is not derelict or dormant. In fact they prefer to do so because it is easier and cheaper to build on. Most dormant, derelict and under-utilised land has a negative value. In my constituency the development corporation has removed the negative value from much of that land, but private developers will still not build on it even though it is being made available.

Things are not as simple as the hon. Gentleman suggests. However, we oppose the new clause because we do not want simplified pl nning zones spawning uncontrollably like amoebae all over the place.

Mr. Steen: Why not?

Mr. Roberts: If that is the intention, we might as well abolish planning altogether. No doubt some Government Members would wish to do that. People throughout the country are afraid that if, unfortunately, the Government were returned for a third term they would destroy planning as we understand it, which protects people and the environment.

Mr. Tracey: The House is familiar with the ingenuity of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen). His speech tonight was typical. He has ranged widely. The Government are grateful for the considerable compliment that he has paid them. In particular, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing will be grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks about the pressure on authorities to dispose of derelict land.

New clause 8 introduces an interesting proposition, which is superficially attractive but is not precisely relevant to what we are trying to do. The new clause would effectively and automatically designate all sites on land registers as simplified planning zones. No regard would be taken of the merits of individual sites so designated. It would not be possible for adjacent land to be considered concurrently with such sites as possible simplified planning zones. Some sites might not be suitable to be simplified planning zones at all. The new clause would remove some of the local planning authorities' discretion in deciding where simplified planning zones should be set up.

Mr. Steen: I was grateful for the Minister's opening remarks. My point is that, in spite of the planning regimes, the Government's efforts and the many millions of pounds made available to release vacant public land, there are still 110,000 acres on the register. Something must be done to release that land. If it is not to be auctioned off, we must withdraw the planning regime that is preventing it being developed.

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend can rest assured that we have taken careful note of what he said. We shall read his speech in some detail in order to see whether it contains a gem that we have missed.

There is the question what sort of planning permission would be bestowed by the deemed simplified planning zones that my hon. Friend has mentioned. We do not want to declare SPZs and just tell people to go and fill in the details without regard to the circumstances of the case. I accept that a good number of sites on the land registers may well be suitable for inclusion in the simplified planning zone regime. However, we believe that we need a flexible and selective way of achieving our aim. The current provision in the Bill would do exactly what we are attempting to do. With all due respect to my hon. Friend, we do not believe that the new clause is needed. I hope that he will seek to withdraw it.

Mr. Steen: Before I consider withdrawing the new clause, I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was just now rising to speak. I should like him to have the opportunity to say something if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I was indeed rising to my feet, but I believe that the House is anxious to make progress. In view of the Minister's reply, I hope that my hon. Friend will agree to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Steen: In view of those helpful comments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 10

SHORTHOLD

'In the case of shorthold tenancies entered into after the coming into force of Part I of this Act the rent payable by the tenant to the landlord shall be the rent provided in the tenancy agreement and the rent officer shall have no power to vary the rent.'.—[Mr. Gow.]

Brought up, and read the First Time.

Mr. Gow: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

It is certainly common ground among my hon. Friend's and it may even be common ground between both sides of the House, that whatever may have been the other consequences of the Rent Acts, which have been in force for 70 years, one undesirable consequence has been to dry up the supply of privately rented accommodation. It is also common ground between both sides of the House that in some areas there is a grave housing shortage. That housing shortage makes it especially difficult for those seeking a job to move from one part of the country to another.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces tried in the Housing Act 1980 to remedy that shortage of private rented accommodation. He introduced—and he was opposed by the Labour party—what is now known as shorthold. It is a precondition for the granting of shorthold in Greater London that a fair rent should be registered. Even outside Greater London, if a shorthold tenancy is entered into between landlord and tenant, with rent agreed between them, either the tenant or the landlord may make application to the rent officer to vary the agreed rent immediately after the agreement has been signed.

Shorthold was designed to remove one of the disincentives to letting, which was the difficulty that landlords had in recovering possession, and the very long security of tenure given not only to the main tenant, but sometimes to members of his family. I believe that the shorthold provisions in the 1980 Act have had only a modest effect in increasing the supply of privately rented accommodation. In many areas there is still unused or under-used accommodation that the landlord—actual or potential—would be anxious to make available to those looking for accommodation if only there could be a reasonable return on his investment.

That is why I believe that for all new lettings under shorthold — I emphasise that my new clause has no retrospective effect — the rent should be as agreed between landlord and tenant. The House will remember that the maximum period for shorthold is only five years. If, as I hope, my hon. Friend the Minister accepts the new clause, some of those who are desperately anxious to find accommodation will have a better prospect of doing so. The potential landlord will be more willing to rent his property if he can get a decent return on his investment, which will make it worth while.

Thus, the sole purpose of the new clause is to improve the prospects of those seeking accommodation. It is both economically and morally wrong for there to be unused or under-used accommodation because of an Act of Parliament or because of the Government's failure to take action which, in their heart, they know would alleviate the distress and hardship caused to many people. If my hon. Friend the Minister requires further time to examine the consequences of the new clause, as he may do, and if he cannot recommend it to the House tonight, I hope that he will at least give an undertaking that it may be possible to move a similar, if not identical, amendment in the other place.

Mr. John Fraser: We are opposed to the new clause. We do not for one moment doubt that if landlords were able to let their properties in areas of acute stress without security of tenure, other than for the maximum period of five years, and without any rent control, there would be takers for it. However, it would lead to the grossest exploitation and ultimately to a vast increase in the responsibilities of housing authorities as shorthold tenancies came to an end and people found themselves bargaining for an even higher rent or thrust back onto the local authority's homeless list. Of course landlords may feel inhibited about letting their properties if there are rent controls, but if one had to choose between protection for the tenant and uncontrolled rents, we would have no difficulty in saying that there should be protection for the tenant.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was formerly the Minister for Housing and Construction, and we are left wondering to what extent he was speaking with some flavour of official Tory party policy.

Mr. Marlow: Two subjects about which the Government, like the Opposition, are deeply concerned are unemployment and homelessness. We all want to overcome those problems——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Gentleman should declare his interest.

Mr. Marlow: Oh dear. The hon. Gentleman is so tedious. He knows that I own an element of rented accommodation which probably cost me somewhat less than his private house cost him.

Like the Government, the Opposition are deeply concerned about homelessness and the problems of unemployment. One way of dealing with both of those problems at the same time is to increase the amount of accommodation available for rent. Another way of overcoming those problems is to help to ease mobility. There are jobs in some parts of the country that people cannot go to because they cannot find the accommodation. Equally, there are houses in other parts of the country that are blocked because, for good reasons, people do not make them available for others to live in.

When, for some reason, a tenant moves out, the landlord may consider what to do. As things stand, if the landlord put his property on the market, he would get a certain price for it. However, if he put a tenant in that property at the present rate of registered rents, the property's value would immediately fall considerably. Thus it is against his interest to put in another tenant. Consequently, property owners tend to sell their properties. That is why the private rented sector of accommodation has gone down and down. Yet it is that sector that should be the flexible part of the market that helps people to move from one part of the country to another.

People cannot move from one council area to another. I know that there is a system of swaps and exchanges, but it is not particularly effective. Many people in the north-east and north-west come south looking for jobs. Someone might find a job but then discover that he cannot get the accommodation. In reality, the accommodation is available, but no one wanting to look after his family or his own self-interest would make it available. That is why we have shorthold. That prevents security of accommodation and prevents a reduction in the property's value. In those circumstances, it is in the interest of the owner to put in a shorthold tenant.

What return will the owner of the property obtain for letting it? If the rent is restricted below the market value, the property could still be sold and the money could be invested elsewhere in order to obtain a better return on it. Thus an artificially low rent means that the property will not come onto the market.

I totally agree with the new clause, and I hope that the Government will take the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and accept it.

Mr. Winnick: As I intend to be brief, I shall not answer at length the points raised by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) other than to say that last time the rented market was deregulated, fewer properties were available to rent, for reasons that we all understand.

I am not surprised that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) should table this new clause. When he was Minister for Housing and Construction he lost the argument over deregulation. However, he resigned not over that but over something else. He lost, but not because the Cabinet disagreed with him. Rather, the Government were afraid that if his wishes were carried out, they would lose any chance of winning the next election. I fear that we have witnessed some sort of rehearsal, and that the hon. Gentleman hopes that the Government will accept step by step something that he has always advocated.

If someone moves into rented accommodation and the rent is clearly exorbitant, it is only right and proper that he should be afforded some protection. But the new clause would remove any possibility of a tenant being able, under a shorthold agreement, to go to the rent officer to see whether his rent could be reassessed. The hon. Gentleman wants to take away that basic protection which tenants now have, even under shorthold. That is why I believe that it would be quite wrong for the Government to accept his new clause.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Not for the first or last time, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) has rendered the House a service, this time in moving the new clause. Those of us who were involved in the passage of the Housing Act 1980 felt that the introduction of shorthold might lead to considerable advantages and opportunities, despite the Opposition's pledge that if they came to power they would repeal the legislation and extend security of tenure to tenants who benefited from it. Understandably and predictably that has had an effect on the number of shortholds that have been granted. That is regrettable, but it is an accepted Opposition power, which they no doubt relish.

But as a result, homelessness in my constituency and elsewhere has increased. Indeed, many of those who are unable to obtain tenancies, where there is plenty of vacant property which could be made available on shorthold or other forms of tenancy at market rents, have had to search the public sector for available property, have swollen the housing waiting lists or have had to pay much higher rents than they would otherwise have had to.

Opposition Members talk about the exploitation of tenants. The real exploitation is that many individuals and young people nationally are unable to obtain any low-cost rented accommodation at the present time. They are the homeless. The properties are available. If the law provides, and the Opposition give it a fair wind, the accommodation is there to satisfy much of the demand.

The sole consequence of their stubborn opposition and the reluctance with which they are dragged into the 20th century of housing legislation is that hundreds of thousands of people are either homeless or paying exorbitant rents because of the Opposition's outdated ideology.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne was the Minister responsible for housing, he put forward proposals in this, as in other areas of the private rented sector, for liberalisation. I believe that he had in mind not only trying to ensure that more housing would be brought on to the market but that the dreadful plight of many people, especially young people, would be alleviated.

As we approach the next general election, I hope that the Government will give serious consideration not only to the proposal contained in the new clause, but to revision of the fundamental Rent Acts which underlie the private sector, at least for new tenancies in the future. If we fail to do that we will continue to have a sore in the private sector of the housing market, and dissatisfaction and elongated waiting lists in the public sector and we will deserve the acrimony of our constituents.

Mr. Cartwright: I know that the House wants to make progress. Therefore, I shall be as brief as possible. I want to make clear my opposition and the opposition of my hon. Friends to the approach in this new clause. I certainly support the view that we need a much greater supply of rented accommodation in this country, certainly in the areas of high housing stress. As I have made clear in previous debates on this issue, I do not believe that the best way to achieve that is to try to breathe new life into the old private rented sector which has been in decay and decline for the whole of this century.

I believe that the relationships and atmosphere which surround the private rented market is such that we shall not get agreement about it. I fear that it will be impossible to encourage people to invest in that approach because it is a matter of considerable political difference between the two sides of the House. Therefore, we should be trying to build on the steadily emerging consensus of trying to find new forms of rented housing which do not have the connotations of the old private landlord. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Assured tenancies."] Yes, provided of course by reputable bodies such as housing associations, building societies and pension funds—bodies of the sort which are not looking for a quick return or a quick kill. I am afraid that the difficulty of that approach is that it has the atmosphere, image and all the connotations of the old private landlord.

I do not doubt for one minute the sincerity of some of the people who have taken part in the debate. However, I have some difficulty in believing that the sort of people who come to my advice centre on Friday nights, homeless and unemployed, will really be helped by having a free market in shorthold tenancies in London. I do not believe that we can have a free balance of bargaining between the landlord and the tenant in a situation of housing shortage such as we have in London. If we ever have that approach, I cannot believe that it will help the people who are in desperate need who cannot afford even the below market rents charged at present. Therefore, I am strongly opposed to the new clause. I hope that the Government will resist it.

Mr. Steen: It is strange that we should have two new clauses, one after the other, dealing with waste. The House tends to talk about trying to change things which exist but the new clause that I had the honour to move and this new clause are both about wasting assets. The clause that I moved was about wasting public assets. It is curious that the Government should have rejected that. This new clause, which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and for which I have a great deal of sympathy and support, has been rejected by the Opposition. That is perhaps a little more to be expected. Therefore, the deregulation of wasted public land was rejected in a proposal which I moved and now the deregulation of private housing waste is being rejected by the Opposition and the spokesman for the alliance.

It is sad that in this country houses are empty and land is unused in the public and private sectors. We continue to argue in the House and nothing is being done to make use of those wasted assets. When the Minister replies, he should recognise that the House is concerned about waste.

The Government have been concerned about waste in local authorities, and they want to privatise services to reduce it. We now have a third of a million acres of land wasting in this country. That should be dealt with. We now have private housing which is being wasted and we should deal with that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying. I am finding it difficult to relate what he is saying to the new clause.

Mr. Steen: I am sorry that you are having difficulty, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The point is being clearly made that my hon. Friend's new clause deals with waste. I am concerned that the Minister should deal with the waste of housing, just as he dealt with the waste of public land on the previous clause. The House wants to hear how we can use housing more effectively, whether in the private or public sector.

If the Minister cannot accept the new clause, can he give some hope that private housing will be better used even if the new clause is not the device he would use? That is the point I was trying to make. I hope that it is now clear.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): If we are concerned about waste, the most obvious example, and a symbol of the present Government's housing policy, is a policy which, because it does not build homes for people in need, generates homelessness and means that far more is spent on accommodating the homeless in bed and breakfast hotels than it would cost to provide them with homes. That is what waste is about and that is the waste for which the Government are responsible.

The new clause is irrelevant. It is based on a fundamental misconception of the causes of the decline of the private rented market. Anyone with any knowledge of the history of private renting over the past 100 years knows that, since the beginning of this century, the market has been in decline for fundamentally economic reasons—because the rate of return that a landlord can expect from renting property is less than he could get by selling it and investing in other assets.

Mr. Steen: The Rent Acts.

Mr. Raynsford: That has nothing to do with the Rent Acts; it has continued systematically over the past 70 years, whatever the hon. Gentleman might say, irrespective of whether the Rent Acts were strengthened or weakened. In fact, the greatest decline came after 1957, when the then Conservative Government sought to reduce controls—[Interruption.] Conservative Members would do well to listen to this. They ushered in the era that was known by the name of Mr. Rachman. He is a symbol of what happened when a Conservative Government sought to reduce tenant control and allow a free market.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and perhaps he would like to listen to what I have to say. Is it not right that the hon. Member should declare an interest in this debate as he is funded by the housing Ministry? Should he not have declared an interest in the debate before he made his speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are beginning to stray a little. The new clause relates to shorthold, and a number of recent remarks have been difficult to relate to the subject under consideration.

8 pm

Mr. Raynsford: The only interest that I have to declare is that I have worked for 14 years in housing and I care deeply about the problems of housing.

The reason I stressed that the new clause was both irrelevant and based on a misconception, is that it is assumed that creating short-term lettings will lead to a surge in the number of lettings coming onto the market. That is a misconception which the Conservative party adopted in the 1970s. After the introduction of shorthold under the Housing Act 1980, the decline in the private rented market continued at much the same rate as before, with only a derisory number of shortholds coming into existence. In London, the evidence for the first year of shortholds was that about 16,000 properties went out of letting in the private market and only about 300 shortholds were created. That shows that the whole shorthold experiement was misconceived and inappropriate.

The evidence is that, when property is decontrolled, there will be exploitation and high rents and tenants will be subject to especially brutal pressures from landlords, as was the case during the Rachman era which followed the Rent Act 1957.

I stress that, for all these reasons, the new clause is taking us in an entirely inappropriate direction for housing policy. If the new clause is passed, private renting will continue to decline and there will be more options for exploitation in London, where people in shorthold tenancies will have to pay higher rents. I accept that there are very few of those people, so not many would be affected, but those in shorthold tenancies would suffer disproportionately.

I sincerely hope that the new clause is decisively rejected.

Mr. John Patten: Most hon. Members are aware of my views about empty housing and homelessness. I profoundly believe that somewhere in the equation of the more than 500,000 private empty flats and houses, and the perhaps 90,000 or more registered homeless, it is possible for sensible men of good will to find ways of unlocking that empty accommodation and so make it possible not only to house the homeless but to help young people and stop the degrading scramble for accommodation by young people seeking jobs in our great cities and for accommodation in our university towns.

I do not like deeply entrenched, long-held views which people are not prepared to reconsider. I much prefer the more modern approach put forward by the SDP spokesman, the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). He showed that, although he is worried about what would happen should there be a measure of deregulation, the alliance has said that it is prepared to consider measured forms of deregulation, such as extensions to the shared tenancy scheme, where it introduces new forms of finance from building societies, responsible and respectable institutions and others. We should go down that road, across the Chamber, to see whether we can do something to unlock the supply of empty, privately rented homes, in the interests of those who need accommodation, be they the homeless, the young or the mobile job seekers.

Having said that, I believe that the shorthold tenancy scheme is excellent. It has done much to help in the way that it was designed to do, and therefore I welcome the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) introduced his debate on shorthold tenancies. The new clause proposes the removal of the shorthold tenancy scheme from the fair rents system. My hon. Friend wants to deregulate—doubtless he will correct me if I am wrong—all lettings made on shorthold after the date on which part I comes into force, both inside and outside London.

My hon. Friend explained the differences that exist in the shorthold scheme between London and other areas under the provision of the Housing Act 1980, introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley) who is now the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) played an important part in helping that Act on to the statute book.

I hope and believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne has today tabled a new clause which is essentially a probing amendment. I have recently spoken in the House about the privately rented sector. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have said that any legislation in the complex area of rent control must wait until after the next general election.

The shorthold tenancy scheme was not designed as a deregulation measure. That is quite clear, and it does not make sense to turn it into one and to deregulate on this type of tenancy alone. We would therefore get partial deregulation, and that would create some difficulties. We must consider the whole system of rent control and see which groups of people fall inside and outside the system, and not insulate those who choose a specific form of letting agreement.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne will accept my assurances that the Government are looking hard at the options for the private rented sector. We are persuaded of the need for reform. I hope and believe my hon. Friend feels that we should legislate rationally and nationally, at the correct time, over the whole area of renting, rather than pick on one valuable and partial scheme for partial deregulation, which would lead to a greater element of confusion in the short term rather than achieve the major aims of the Government to house more people in empty houses and flats which should not be empty because of the workings of the Rent Acts. I hope that my hon. Friend will consider withdrawing his new clause after hearing my comments.

Mr. Gow: I cannot conceal from the House my disappointment at my hon. Friend's reply. However, I think that it would be appropriate that I should beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 12

GRANTS FOR IMPROVEMENT OR REPAIR OF COMMON PARTS

'. Part XV of the Housing Act 1985 (grants for work of improvement, repair and conversion) is amended in accordance with Schedule (COMMONS PARTS GRANTS) so as to provide for a new form of grant towards the costs of works required for the improvement or repair of the common parts of a building containing one or more flats.'.—[Mr. Robert B. Jones.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Deal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: new clause 16—Grants for flats and maisonettes—

'For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that a repair and improvement grant under the Housing Act 1985 may be given notwithstanding that the repair or improvement benefits more than one dwelling house or flat.'.

Amendment No. 1, new schedule—Common Parts Grants—

1.—(1) Section 460 of the Housing Act 1985 (general description of main grants) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1) omit the word "and" after the reference to special grants and after the reference to repairs grants insert "common parts grants (sections 498A to 498G)".

(3) In subsection (2) for paragraphs (b) and (c) substitute—

"(b) the improvement or repair of dwellings,

(c) the improvement or repair of the common parts of a building including one or more flats, and"

2. In section 462(1) of the Housing Act 1985 (preliminary condition for grants: the age of the property), after paragraph (b) insert ", or

(c) a common parts grant in respect of a building which was erected after 2nd October 1961.".

3. In section 463(1) of the Housing Act 1985 (preliminary condition for eligibility for grant: the interest of the applicant in the property) for "may entertain an application for a grant only if" substitute "shall not entertain an application for a grant, other than an application for a common parts grant, unless".

4. After section 464 of the Housing Act 1985 insert—

Preliminary conditions for application for common parts grant

464A.—(1) A local housing authority shall not entertain an application for a common parts grant unless they are satisfied as regards the relevant works that the applicant either—

(a) has a duty to carry them out, or

(b) has power to carry them out (there being no-one under a duty to carry them out) and has a qualifying interest in the building or in a dwelling in the building, and that, at the date of the application, at least the required proportion of the dwellings in the building is occupied by tenants.

(2) The following are qualifying interests for the purposes of subsection (1)(b)—

(a) an estate in fee simple absolute in possession,

(b) a term of years absolute of which not less than five years remains unexpired at the date of the application,

(c) a tenancy to which section 1 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 applies (long tenancies at low rents),

(d) a protected tenancy, a secure tenancy, a protected occupancy or a statutory tenancy;

(e) a tenancy which satisfies such conditions as may be prescribed by order of the Secretary of State.

(3) The required proportion mentioned in subsection (1) is three-quarters or such other proportion as may be—

(a) prescribed for the purposes of this section by order of the Secretary of State, or

(b) approved by him, in relation to a particular case or description of case, on application by the local housing authority; and "tenant" for the purposes of that requirement means a person who has an interest within any of paragraphs (b) to (e) of subsection (2) by virtue of which he occupies a dwelling in the building as his only or main residence.

(4) An order under this section—

(a) may make different provision with respect to different cases or descriptions of case, including different provision for different areas, and

(b) shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(5) This section has effect subject to section 513 (parsonages, application by charities, &c.)".

5. In section 466(1) of the Housing Act 1985 (grants requiring consent of the Secretary of State) for "or intermediate grant" substitute ", intermediate grant or common parts grant".

6. After section 498 of the Housing Act 1985 insert—

COMMON PARTS GRANT

Works for which common parts grants may begiven

498A.—(1) The works for which a common parts grant may be given are works required for the improvement or repair of the common parts of a building in which there are one or more flats, other than works for the provision of a dwelling.

(2) For this purpose—

(a) "flat" means a dwelling which is a separate set of premises, whether or not on the same floor, divided horizontally from some other part of the building, and

(b) "common parts" includes the structure and exterior of the building and common facilities provided, whether in the building or elsewhere, for persons who include the occupiers of one or more dwellings in the building.

Standard of repair to be attained

498B.—(1) The local housing authority shall not approve an application for a common parts grant in respect of a building unless they are satisfied that on completion of the relevant works the common parts of the building will be in reasonable repair.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(2) If in the opinion of the authority the relevant works are more extensive than is necessary for the purpose of securing that the common parts of the building will attain that standard, the authority may, with the consent of the applicant, treat the application as varied so that the relevant works include only such works as seem to the authority necessary for that purpose; and they may then approve the application as so varied.

Ratable value limit.

498C.—(1) The local housing authority shall not approve an application for a common parts grant in respect of a building if, on the date of the application, the average rateable value of the dwellings in the building exceeds the limit specified for the purposes of this section by order of the Secretary of State.

(2) The consent of the Treasury is required for the making of an order.

(3) An order—

(a) may make different provision with respect to different cases or descriptions of case, including different provision for different areas, and

(b) shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(4) For the purpose of this section—

(a) where a dwelling is a hereditament for which a rateable value is shown in the valuation list, the rateable value is the value shown;

(b) where a dwelling forms part only of such a hereditament, or consists of or forms part of more than one such hereditament, the rateable value is such value as the local housing authority, after consultation with the applicant as to an appropriate apportionment or aggregation shall determine.

(5) This section does not apply to buildings in housing action areas.

Common parts grants are discretionary

498D.—(1) A local housing authority may approve an application for a common parts grant in such circumstances as they think fit.

(2) Subsection (1) has effect subject to the following provisions (which restrict the cases in which applications may be approved)— section 465 (works already begun), section 466 (cases in which consent of Secretary of State is required), section 498B (standard of repair to be attained), and section 498C (rateable value limit).

Common parts grants: estimated expense of works.

498E.—(1) Where a local housing authority approve an application for a common parts grant, they shall determine the amount of the expenses which in their opinion are proper to be incurred for the execution of the relevant works and shall notify the applicant of that amount.

(2) If, after an application for a grant has been approved, the authority are satisfied that owing to circumstances beyond the control of the applicant the relevant works will not be carried out on the basis of the estimate contained in the application, they may, on receiving a further estimate, redetermine the estimated expense in relation to the grant.

(3) If the applicant satisfies the authority that—

(a) the relevant works cannot be, or could not have been, carried out without carrying out additional works, and

(b) this could not have been reasonably foreseen at the time the application was made, the authority may determine a higher amount under subsection (1).

Common parts grant: limit on expense eligible for grant

498F.—(1) Except in a case or description of case in respect of which the Secretary of State approves a higher eligible expense, the eligible expense for the purposes of a common parts grant is so much of the estimated expense as does not exceed the prescribed amount.

(2) In subsection (1) "the prescribed amount" means an amount prescribed, or ascertained in a manner prescribed, by order of the Secretary of State.

(3) An order—

(a) may make different provision with respect to different cases or descriptions of case, including different provision for different areas, and

(b) shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Commons.

Commons parts grants: determination of amount.

498G.—(1) The amount of a common parts grant shall be fixed by the local housing authority when they approve the application, and shall not exceed the appropriate percentage of the eligible expense.

(2) The authority shall notify the applicant of the amount of the grant together with the notification under section 498E(1) (notification of estimated expense of relevant works).

(3) Where the authority redetermine the amount of the estimated expense under section 498E(2) (new estimate where works cannot be carried out in accordance with original estimate), they shall make such other adjustments relating to the amount of the grant as appear to them to be appropriate; but the amount of the grant shall not be increased beyond the amount which could have been notified when the application was approved if the estimate contained in the application had been of the same amount as the further estimate.

(4) Where the authority redetermine the amount of the estimated expense under section 498E(3) (redetermination where additional works prove necessary), the eligible expense under section 498F shall be recalculated and if on the recalculation the amount of the eligible expense is greater than it was at the time when the application was approved, the amount of the grant shall be increased and the applicant notified accordingly.".

7. In section 499(3) of the Housing Act 1985 for "this Part" substitute "the following provisions of this Part down to section 507".

8. In section 511 of the Housing Act 1985 (payment of grants: general), in subsection (3) (b) for "or repairs grant" substitute ", repairs grant or common parts grant".

9. In section 513 of the Housing Act 1985 (special cases; parsonages, applications by charities, &c.), in subsection (2) (provisions disapplied) after the reference to section 464 omit the word "and" and insert—

"so much of section 464A(1) (b) (preliminary conditions for application for common parts grant) as requires the applicant to have a qualifying interest in the premises, and ".

10.—(1) Section 514 of the Housing Act 1985 (power of local housing authority to carry out works with agreement of person by whom application for grant might be made) is amended as follows.

(2) For subsection (2) (definition of "requisite interest") substitute

"(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a person having the requisite interest is, except in the case of a common parts grant, to a person who has an owner's interest in every parcel of land on which the relevant works are to be carried out; and in this subsection "owner's interest" has the same meaning as in section 463(1) (a).

(2A) The reference in subsection (1) to a person having the requisite interest is in the case of a common parts grant to a person who as regard the relevant works either—

(a) has a duty to carry them out, or

(b) has power to carry them out (there being no one under a duty to carry them out) and has a qualifying interest in the building or in a dwelling in the building;

and in this subsection 'qualifying interest' 'has the same meaning as in section 464A(1) (b).".

11. In Section 515 of the Housing Act 1985, for subsections (2) and (3) (effect on grant of disposal by applicant of his interest in the property) substitute—

"(2) Where an application for a grant is approved but before the certified date the applicant ceases to be a person entitled to apply for a grant of that description—

(a) in the case of an improvement grant, intermediate grant, special grant or repairs grant, no grant shall be paid or, as the case may be, no further instalments shall be paid, and

(b) in the case of a common parts grant, the local housing authority may refuse to pay the grant or any further instalment, and the authority may demand that any instalment of the grant which has been paid be repaid forthwith, together with interest from the date on which it was paid until repayment at such reasonable rate as the authority may determine.

(3) In subsection (2) 'the certified date' means the date certified by the local housing authority as the date on which the dwelling, house or, as the case may be, the common parts of the building, first become fit for occupation or use after the completion of the relevant works to the satisfaction of the authority.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (2) an applicant ceases to be a person entitled to apply for a grant, other than a common parts grant, if he—

(a) ceases to have an owner's interest in every parcel of land on which the relevant works are to be or have been carried out, or

(b) ceases to be a tenant of the dwelling;

and in this subsection 'owner's interest' and 'tenant' have the same meaning as in section 463(1)(a) and (b).

(5) For the purposes of subsection (2) an applicant ceases to be a person entitled to apply for a common parts grant if he—

(a) ceases to have a duty to carry out the relevant works, or

(b) ceases to have power to carry them out or to have a qualifying interest in the building or in a dwelling in the building;

and in this subsection 'qualifying interest' has the same meaning as in section 464A(1)(b).".

12. In section 518 of the Housing Act 1985 (meaning of "dwelling for a disabled occupant" and related expressions), for subsection (3) substitute—

"(3) In this Part 'improvement'—

(a) in relation to a dwelling for a disabled occupant, includes the doing of works required for making the dwelling suitable for his accommodation, welfare or employment, and

(b) in relation to the common parts of a building which includes such a dwelling, includes the doing of works required for making the common parts suitable for use by a disabled occupant of a dwelling.".

13. Renumber section 519 of the Housing Act 1985 (meaning of "reasonable repair") as subsection (1) of that section and after it insert—

"(2) In determining what is ' reasonable repair' in relation to the common parts of a building, a local housing authority shall have regard to—

(a) the age and character of the building and the locality in which it is situated, and

(b) the character of the dwellings in the building and the period during which they are likely to be available for use as dwellings, and shall disregard the state of internal decorative repair of the building and the dwellings in it.".

14. In Section 526 of the Housing Act 1985 (the index to Part XV) at the appropriate places insert—

"common parts (for the purposes of common parts grant)	section 498A(2)(b)"
"common parts grant	sections 460 and 498A"
"flat (for the purposes of common parts grant).	section 498A(2)(a)",

Amendment No. 29, in clause 10, page 26, line 9, at end insert—

'(da) the recovery of service charges in respect of the cost of grant-aided works;'.

Amendment No. 31, in page 83, line 14 [Schedule 2], at end insert—

SERVICE CHARGES IN RESPECT OF THE COST OF GRANT-AIDED WORKS

4(A).—(1) In the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, after section 20 insert—

"Limitation of service charges: grant-aided works

20A. Where relevant costs are incurred or to be incurred on the carrying out of works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV of the Housing Act 1985 (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion), the amount of the grant shall be deducted from the costs and the amount of the service charge payable shall be reduced accordingly.".

(2) In section 21 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 (request for summary of relevant costs), in subsection (5) (contents of summary) after "shall" insert "state whether any of the costs relate to works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV of the Housing Act (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion) and".

(3) In section 47 of the Housing Act 1985 (limitation on service charges payable after disposal of house by public sector authority), after subsection (3) add—

"(4) Where relevant costs are incurred or to be incurred on the carrying out of works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion), the amount of the grant shall be deducted from the costs and the amount of the service charge payable shall be reduced accordingly.".

(4) In section 48 of the Housing Act 1985 (request for summary of relevant costs), after subsection (3) (contents of summary) insert—

"(3A) The summary shall also state whether any of the costs relate to works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion).'.

Amendment No. 148, in clause 38, page 75, line 31, after '3', insert '4A,'.

Amendment No. 150, in line 37, after '4', insert '(Grants for improvement or repair of common parts)'.

Amendment No. 151, in line 37, after '1', insert '(Common parts grants)'.

Amendment No. 152, in line 38 [Clause 38], after '3', insert '4A,'.

Mr. Jones: I do not suppose that I am alone in the House—and I see on the Amendment Paper a new clause from the Opposition on this matter—in receiving complaints from constituents and local authorities about what appears to be a gap in the housing renovation system. The complaints concern the common parts of flats and houses divided into flats.

At present, the system provides for two requirements. The first is that a proof of ownership must be provided, and the second provides for a certificate that the application for grant should relate to a property which can be occupied or is capable of letting. That is not the case with common parts, except in the rare cases where those parts are owned singly or in conjunction with a neighbouring flat.

As I have said, there is no real problem in relation to individual flats. Both landlord and tenant can fill the two requirements that I have mentioned. The legal difficulty arises in relation to the common parts which cannot be lived in. That is not a satisfactory state of affairs. I have therefore tabled the new clause and the concomitant amendments. The objective of the new clause is fairly simple, but hon. Members will have noticed that the methodology is more complicated than I would have wished.

I set out to produce a simpler version and to try to amend the present scheme. However, the most obvious way of doing that, after considering the complexity of the legislation, was to create a new type of grant—a common parts grant which would be discretionary for local authorities. As I have said, it may seem over-elaborate, but I think that that is the best way of dealing with it.

There are a number of differences between the proposed new grant and existing grants. Two particular aspects of the grant distinguish it from present grants—the works for which the grant may be made and those eligible to apply. In this context "common parts" includes the structure, exterior, common areas and common facilities in a building divided into flats. Although the main problems arise with blocks of flats, these proposals will also apply to converted houses and flats in other buildings.

The grant will be available to the person who is under an obligation to carry out the works. In most cases that will be the landlord. There may, however, be other cases where no one is under an obligation to carry out essential works of repair, perhaps because leases are defective, as we considered in an earlier amendment. In the case of improvements it is unlikely that anyone would be under an obligation to carry them out. In this situation, any person who has the power to carry out works will be eligible for grant provided that he has an interest in the block or in a flat in the block, whether as a long leaseholder, tenant, landlord, management association, and so on.

It might be helpful to hon. Members if I outline other ways in which the new grant will differ from existing grants. Certificates of future occupation will not be required. Instead, I propose that grant should not be available if more than one quarter of the flats in a building are vacant at the time of application. This is an arbitrary figure but it is designed to provide a safeguard against someone making a profit from the improvement of a substantially vacant block by selling the flats as soon as work has been finished.

Common parts grant would not be available if the average rateable value of the dwellings in a building exceeds a specified limit. This is to avoid the Chelsea problem. The limit will be for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to determine, as is the case with other renovation grants, and I have no doubt that he will adopt the same principle so that the rateable value limits will be aimed at making the new grant available to those people and properties in the greatest need.

It will have been noted by hon. Members that I have also tabled consequential amendments to section 47 of the Housing Act 1985 and to the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. These are the provisions which were formerly in schedule 19 to the Housing Act 1980. They provide that, folllowing payment of a common parts grant, the amount of service charge payable will be reduced by the amount of the grant. This is to avoid tenants being caned a second time. In addition, similar provision is made for existing house renovation grants.

This is a limited series of measures, which will not apply to a large number of grants, at least to start with, but they will do a great deal to plug a serious gap in the present system which has deterred local authorities which are determined to improve blocks of flats in their areas but have not been able to do so because of the quirks in the present law. Therefore, I commend my new clause to the House.

Mr. John Fraser: May I speak to the associated Opposition amendment? The law on improvement grants for blocks of flats and maisonettes has turned out to be plain daft. There have been a number of cases where substantial grants could be given for alterations, repairs or improvements to individual flats and yet where necessary work on a roof which gave protection to more than one flat requiring a modest amount of money, as a result of rulings by the Department of the Environment and the interpretation of the law could not be undertaken. That has led to the most acute distress. A case is proceeding at the moment between the owners of a block of flats in my constituency and the Department of the Environment. I am not sure whether it has yet been concluded but it has caused the most acute distress and the law needs to be remedied quickly.

The Minister gave us an undertaking in Committee when we raised this issue that the Government would address themselves to it. I do not know whether they have in any way inspired the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones). If they have, we welcome the inspiration and we hope that the Government will be able to accept the amendment, with which we are happy to associate ourselves.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I should like to join that association in views. There is a clear gap in the law. Home improvement grants have failed to help many people who live in accommodation that is effectively shared, or the common parts of which are shared. If the Minister does not respond now by saying that the Government accept the amendments as drafted, I hope that something will be introduced in another place because this is an appropriate Act in which to do something. The new clause put forward by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) is more or less appropriate and is certainly sufficiently correct in principle to be adapted by the Department of the Environment within a short time.

Clearly here is an area where property has often been more neglected and so there is more substantial need for moneys for home improvement than in many of the other areas to which money has been directed so far. There is a gap in the law and it appears that there is many-sided agreement on this. I look forward to a positive response.

8.15 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): This is another respect in which leaseholders are suffering and there can be no doubt that there is a major defect in the law. Over the past few months I have had a number of bitter and angry letters from people in my constituency who have not been allowed an improvement grant. It is clear that even the Conservative Wandsworth council has blamed the Minister for a decision which has given rise to this difficulty.

I was given this undertaking by the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), in April:

> "We are, however, currently considering the possibility of an amendment in the Housing and Planning Bill now before Parliament, to remedy the situation."

Therefore, I hope that the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) is Government-inspired and is the way in which the Government, in a slightly roundabout way, are seeking to meet that commitment.

This is an urgent problem. Some of the people who have been held up in their application for an improvement grant are suffering from damp, leaking roofs and so on. There is not a moment to waste in implementing this measure. If the Minister accepts this series of amendments, as I assume he will, will he give an undertaking as to when the provision will come into effect so that those who are waiting will know how much longer they will have to wait?

Mr. John Patten: I am well aware of the consequences, particularly in London, of the home improvement grant legislation. There is a gap in the law which has been recognised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones), the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and the Labour Front Bench spokesmen. Indeed, in Committee, the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) raised this important point. That is why I am grateful to my hon. Friend for tabling new clause 12 and the consequential amendments which will remove the anomaly in the Housing Act 1985 by enabling grants to be given for works to the common parts of buildings including flats.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) mentioned Wandsworth. Indeed, one of the people who has pressed powerfully on the Government the case for this change in the law has been that excellent Conservative leader in Wandsworth, Councillor Paul Beresford. I am sure that he will welcome this news this evening. I also welcome the proposed consequential amendment on service charges. It is important to ensure——

Mr. Rooker: Come on.

Mr. Patten: Everyone is allowed a couple of minutes during a bipartisan evening.

It is important to ensure that leaseholders who pay variable service charges will be able to benefit from this new grant. Here again, it is a duty on me to say that I applaud the excellent decision reached by the excellent chairman of the housing committee of Westminster city council, Councillor Patricia Kirwan, to enter into a voluntary agreement with private landlords on a new code to regulate private lettings in the city of Westminster. We are fortunate to have people such as Councillors Beresford and Kirwan in local government.

Mr. Rooker: What about Dick Knowles?

Mr. Patten: I would certainly associate Councillor Dick Knowles with my remarks about the need to have good leaders in local government in all political parties. He is always wonderfully rude to me in the friendliest sort of way whenever I meet him.

I have little to add to what my hon. Friend has said about his new clause and the consequential amendments. He put the case for this urgently needed change clearly and I am extremely happy to accept, lock stock and barrel, his new clause and the amendments. In saying that, it means that new clause 16 cannot be accepted because it is not drafted in a way that makes it acceptable to the Government. Of course, it has an identical intention, and I recognise the issue raised by the hon. Member for Norwood in Committee. I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordhsire, West.

Mr. Dubs: When will it come into effect?

Mr. Patten: I forgot to deal with that point. It will come into effect when the Bill becomes law.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New schedule agreed to.

—[Mr. Robert Jones.]

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move Government amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 6, leave out from 'flat,' to end of line 15 and insert

'44 per cent. plus two per cent. for each complete year by which the qualifying period exceeds two years, up to a maximum of 70 per cent.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in page 3, line 7, at end insert

'(5)(a) In the case of a flat to which subsection (2)(b) applies the District Valuer shall on the application of a person exercising the right to buy to determine the value of the flat in whose block there has been no transfer for value of fewer than three flats in that block (other than a transfer for value on the exercise of the right to buy) give formal notice to the landlord requesting the landlord to offer for sale, with vacant possession a similar flat in the same block

(b) on receipt of such formal notice the landlord shall do his utmost to comply with the notice and shall notify the Secretary of State in writing of the steps which he proposes to take to comply with the notice within three weeks of the receipt thereof.

(c) The landlord shall notify the District Valuer of a sale and the price at which the sale was made within seven days of the exchange of contracts for that sale.

(d) in determining the value of the flat the District Valuer shall take full account of any price notified to him under subsection (c).'

Mr. Pattie: Clause 1 of the Bill, as amended in Committee, provides for a three-tier system of discount on houses and flats sold under the right to buy. The effect of clause 1 as it stands is that for houses the scale would start at 32 per cent. for tenants with the minimum two years, and rise to a maximum of 60 per cent. by steps of 1 per cent. for each of the tenant's qualifying years in excess of two. For flats, in general, the scale would run, as the Bill sets out in its original form, from 42 per cent. by 1 per cent. steps to 70 per cent. This was the proposal in the Bill as introduced.

The amendment tabled in Committee by my hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) made special provision for flats in deck access blocks and tower blocks with 10 or more floors. Under their amendment the scale for such flats would start at 50 per cent. and rise by 1 per cent. steps to a maximum of 80 per cent.

When we debated that amendment in Committee I suggested that a special discount scale for certain categories of flats could have unfortunate effects. I do not wish to repeat that in detail and I am sure that hon. Members are well aware of my views. However, I recognise my hon. Friends' strength of feeling in Committee that we ought to go beyond the simple 10 per cent. increase in discount on flats for which the Bill, as introduced, provided.

The amendment does that, but it avoids the complication of three different discount scales by providing for better discounts on flats of any kind sold under the right to buy. This is the Government's response to the painful defeat I experienced in Standing Committee by an all-party group on an amendment put down by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North.

It is a dreadful experience to be defeated in Committee. One gets into terrible trouble with the Whips and derision is poured onto one's head by colleagues. I realised I had to claw back as best I could. What I have done in this amendment is to provide for a flat tenant's discount to rise by 2 per cent. steps. Therefore, a tenant with a minimum of two years' standing—necessary to exercise the right to buy—would be entitled to a discount of 44 per cent. and a maximum of 70 per cent. would be reached after only 15 years.

I will give a moment of detail on this as it is important. I am advised that this provision would give much the same average discount as tenants of flats in deck access and tower blocks would have received if my hon. Friend's amendment were enacted in its present form—about 65 per cent. Under my proposal, however, all the tenants of flats, not just tenants of flats in the categories annunciated by my hon. Friend's amendment in Committee, would benefit. Under my hon. Friend's proposal, less than about half of flat tenants would have been eligible for the higher discount. I hope that this change, together with other provisions in the Bill, will encourage tenants to think seriously about buying.

Mr. Hughes: The other statistic which would be helpful to know would be the difference that this would make to the revenue of local authorities as against the present position and as against the position as it would be on the basis of the original drafted clause. On the present rate of sales it would be helpful to know what the difference will be. One of the key factors is not the effect on people's right to buy but the effect on the revenue accounts of the local authorities who have one property less.

Mr. Patten: That is a perfectly proper question, but unfortunately I cannot answer it properly or even give an improper answer drafted by my civil servants. The civil servants are very good at drafting improper answers when asked.

We cannot predict what the effect of this legislation will be on flat sales—so far, the number of flat sales have been extremely small. Only 2 or 3 per cent. of all sales through the right to buy have been flat sales. Sales have been extremely restricted. Thus, we cannot predict the impact of an increase of 10 per cent. discount or the effect of shortening from 30 years to 15 years the period during which the maximum can accrue will have on people's behaviour.

I hope it will encourage people to think seriously about buying their flats. However, we do not know if it will. I cannot say, therefore, without going into the funniest arithmetic of all, what the effects will be on local government finance. The fact that only 3 per cent. of right to buy purchasers have been for flats means that, at the present, the effect on revenue has been minimal. I cannot give a straight answer. I have not satisfied the hon. Gentleman, but I have owned up to the fact that I cannot give a straight answer.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful for the Minister's answer. Although there may be statistics, I understand his problem. Is his Department proposing to compensate local authorities for any increased sales which they suffer as a result of this legislation becoming law?

Mr. Patten: I do not like the use of "suffer" in this context. The position will remain exactly as it is with the right to buy.

I now turn to amendment No. 5 tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) whom I disappointed so much in the last debate but one. We debated this issue in Committee on 8 April and I had the feeling that I was indirectly addressing my hon. Friend even though he was not a Committee member. I had an uneasy prickle that somewhere behind me was the figure of my hon. Friend and that his hand might descend on my collar at any time.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North tabled a new clause to give effect to the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. We had a good debate in Committee and I think my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne had a chance to study that particular debate. I have not got much to add to what I said in that debate. There are some practical difficulties.

My hon. Friend's scheme is certainly ingenious, but I fear that practical difficulties remain to be resolved. I am not suggesting that the practical problems are insoluble. However, before adding such novel, complex and costly procedures to the statute book we have to be sure that the scale of the problem justifies a move of this kind. There is no clear evidence to suggest that it does. I am in a position to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne for the role he played when he was Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction. He set up, with the co-operation of the London boroughs of Ealing and Wandsworth — I am afraid I must mention Wandsworth again as that was the other co-operative body —a study to consider the effects of the sort of situation which my hon. Friend imagined.

The results offered no support for the view that the valuation set on flats by borough valuers or district valuers are excessive. I set out the exact facts and figures in my answer in Committee to the new clause put down by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. We are continuing to monitor the sale and resale of flats in these areas under the scheme set up by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. So far we have not received a shred of evidence about over-valuation. I agree that this sample is not very large. There was no evidence to show that a scheme of the kind proposed by my hon. Friend was necessary.

I hope that my hon. Friend will consider withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. Gow: I welcome the provision of extra discount for those who buy flats, and I congratulate my successor on that part of the Bill that is before us. What is now section 128 of the Housing Act 1985 provides that "any question . . . as to the value of a dwelling-house . . . shall be determined by the district valuer".

The purpose of my amendment is to give further protection to the purchaser of a flat. I wish to move from the particular to the general.

8.30 pm

On 5 April there came to the office in Eastbourne a constituent who is considering exercising the right to buy. The house that he is minded to buy is one to which the Housing Defects Act 1984 applies. It is a prefabricated, reinforced concrete house. Quite understandably, my constituent was dissatisfied with the value placed upon that house by the Eastbourne borough council. He had previously been to see his Member of Parliament, who agreed with him that the valuation placed on the house by the borough council was too high. My constituent therefore applied, as he is entitled to do under the Housing Act 1980, to the district valuer for a determination of the value.

On 28 February 1986 the district valuer wrote to my constituent in the following terms:

"Reference is made to the Notice served on the Eastbourne Borough Council requiring my determination of the value of the above property in accordance with the provisions of Section 11 of the Housing Act 1980. The property was inspected on 16 January 1986."

I note in passing that the inspection was carried out on 16 January 1986 but that the letter was not written until 28 February 1986. The district valuer then said:

"Representations, either verbal and/or written, from the landlord and the tenant have been considered together with all relevant valuations and available market evidence."

Those are the words that I want to underline to the House and in particular to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing. The district valuer said that representations, together with all relevant valuations and available market evidence, had been considered. You may find it immensely surprising, Mr. Deputy Speaker—as I do—since this is a prefabricated, reinforced concrete house, that the district valuer then said:

"No structural survey has been made."

Following my constituent's visit on 5 April, I wrote to the district valuer on 8 April and said:

"In the sixth paragraph of your Determination you say that you have considered 'all relevant valuations and available market evidence.' So that I may advise my Constituent, could you please make available to me those 'relevant valuations and available market evidence' which you considered? Why did you make no structural survey of this property?"

It was not the district valuer who replied to my letter of 8 April. On the contrary, the reply came from the assistant chief valuer, land services and taxation division of the Inland Revenue—a valuer, no doubt, of great distinction. He said:

"In view of my earlier correspondence with you, the District Valuer at Eastbourne has forwarded me a copy of your letter to him dated 8 April. It would not be appropriate for him"— that is, the district valuer—

"to give the information which you now request. The DV has made his statutory determination using his professional knowledge and taking into account all relevant matters of which he was aware . . . I regret that I consider further discussion of any individual cases subsequent to a determination would serve no useful purpose."

But what was it for which I asked? I asked for the evidence upon which he had based his judgment and for all relevant valuations and available market evidence. I also asked him why there had been no structural survey of the property.

What will be the position of those who are considering purchasing a flat? That was a house. There are not many examples of prefabricated, reinforced concrete houses changing hands between one purchaser and another, both of whom are in the private sector, because it is virtually impossible, as the Opposition know, to get a mortgage. As the hon. Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) know, the number of approved methods of repair is not very great. If that was the reply that was given in respect of a prefabricated, reinforced concrete house by the district valuer, where there was little evidence of the open market value, how much more difficult would it be to establish the value of a flat in a block of flats where no other sales had taken place?

I am second to none in my admiration for the professional skill and expertise of district valuers, but we are asking them under the 1980 Act, reproduced in the 1985 Act, particularly in the case of flats—however estimable, highly qualified and devoted they may be—to do something which even the wisest man cannot do. Even the hon. Members for Perry Barr and for Norwood, and even the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), were he here, could not say, however wise they may be, what would be the market value of the first flat on the 15th floor that was about to be sold.

The only way to give real assistance to the district valuer in his task is to try to sell one of those flats on the open market. If one asked the finest estate agents—there may be a number of estate agents on the Opposition Benches to whom we could give this task—to try to find a purchaser, then we should know the open market value of that flat.

The purpose of the amendment is to provide protection for those who wish to purchase a flat. The value that is frequently placed upon a flat — here I respectfully disagree with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing —means that prospective tenants do not buy. Of course my hon. Friend is right to say that there is no evidence. The reason for the lack of evidence is that few deck access flats have been sold. One cannot say that the valuations of deck access flats are proper valuations, because when a prospective purchaser is told what the open market value is he says, "I'm not going to go ahead at that value." That is why there is no evidence.

Before he had heard my modest contribution to this debate, my hon. Friend said that he was unable to accept the amendment. Having heard what I have said, I hope that he may be able to accept it, or that, if he is unable to accept it this evening his noble Friend, who is to pilot the Bill through another place, will look again at this matter. It is not good enough to say that there is no evidence. The evidence is there in this dramatic way. Part of the reason for my hon. Friend's introduction of extra discounts for flats was that such a tiny number of flats had been sold. Why had such a tiny number of flats been sold? It was because either the district council, or the borough council, or the district valuer, had placed a value upon the flat that the tenant knew was nowhere near the price that he would be able to obtain on a resale.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gow: No. I think that I detect the mood of the House. It is anxious to make progress. I have said enough to explain my case.

Mr. Cartwright: The formulation in the Government amendment leaves the Bill in a tidier state than it had reached in Committee. It is a great deal better to have only two ranges of discount instead of three. The argument for having a greater discount for the purchase of flats and maisonettes is that they are less attractive propositions and there are far more associated problems. I am glad that the Minister was a little cautious in the way in which he presented his amendment. He clearly did not necessarily suggest that these discounts would result in a great flow of purchases.

Like many of us he understands that many other problems are involved. Practical difficulties are associated with buying a flat or maisonette, and there are problems of service and maintenance charges. To be fair, the Government have tried to deal with those matters in other clauses. Problems are associated with the general environment of the block and the unattractiveness of some council flats and maisonettes. A problem follows from the resale of housing of the general quality of which we are talking. All these matters will have a much bigger impact than discount on whether more flats and maisonettes are sold.

I underline what the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) has said. In constituencies such as mine and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), there is no evidence at all of the sale of flats of any sort, public or private. If we consider a flat in a singularly rundown council estate, whether it is in a tower block on a deck access block or is a maisonette in a high-density development, there is no evidence at all to enable us to decide what is a reasonable market value for that property, given not just the square footage or facilities it contains but the general area in which it is situated, its surrounding environment, and all the features that go to make up the package that someone will buy.

On the basis of that kind of experience, some of my constituents who have been brave enough—some would say foolhardy enough—to buy flats in such an area may have paid more than it was reasonable to expect them to pay. Thus the case made out by the hon. Member for Eastbourne is very good. I hope that the Minister will consider the possibility suggested, because it is important that we try to discover what is a reasonable price in an open market for some of the properties we expect tenants to buy.

Mr. Marlow: I thank the Minister for the gracious, graceful and highly intelligent way in which he has introduced his amendment. I also find very persuasive the amendment introduced by the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gower). He will not be surprised by my saying that, because I put forward a similar amendment in Committee, inspired by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne.

There is a great justification for having a higher discount on flats than applies to houses. First, as has been said by at least two hon. Members, we have not sold many flats. Secondly, not many flats have been sold because when a house is purchased there is an unavoidable annual commitment to pay the mortgage. However, when a flat is purchased there is the unavoidable annual commitment of paying the mortgage, the insurance, the cost of keeping a roof on the block of flats, and the service charges, so if there is a higher percentage discount on the sale of a flat. The actual percentage that has to be paid as unavoidable annual commitment is probably much the same for a flat as it would be for a house. That is why the amendment is justified.

Discussions have taken place since the first amendment was passed by the Committee. There were difficulties about how much money would be involved, but we are delighted that the Treasury has come up trumps. The amendment now extends the legislation a much greater range of flats; it was restricted before. It also provides that while a person who has been in residence in a flat for between two and eight years does not receive quite as big a discount as under the previous provision. A person who has been in residence for between eight and 15 years actually gets a bigger discount. It is quite often a person in that category who is better able to buy the property. Thus the probability is that, under this amendment, more people in the deck access and tower block type of flats will buy their flats. In addition, a whole other raft of tenants will be encouraged to buy flats at a higher rate of discount. The whole proposal is very exciting. It provides a wonderful opportunity for many people to purchase the homes in which they have been living, and it can have a great effect on improving the environment in which so many of our citizens now live.

8.45 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I want to raise two points, the first relating to the change in discount rules and the other relating to the amendment of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). In an intervention this afternoon, I asked the Minister a question because of the concern which I have and which Liberal and alliance-run councils and many other councils have—that, with every change in the rules adding to discounts, whether for houses or flats, there is no compensation back to the local authorities for what in effect they lose in terms of housing stock.

What is involved may indeed be the least desirable accommodation. If we accept the entitlement of people to claim the right to buy and if there is difficulty, as the Government have found, in encouraging people to buy flats in tower blocks, then the Government pretend their policy is more effective by giving greater and greater incentives. If the increase as a result of this policy is not much beyond 4 per cent., the Government will probably give away flats in tower blocks in order to show what a successful policy they have. That is certainly where this policy leads; I have no doubt that such a measure will be introduced if the percentage increase remains low. The problem for the local authorities remains the same. Those with the largest number of flats in constituencies and boroughs such as Southwark and the largest number of flats that are difficult to rent have the greatest problem in accommodating people in decent housing.

Since I first came into the House and subsequently, I have expressed my concern and scepticism about the present legislation. With each change the Government have made to the law, I believe they have added to the discounts without adding at all to the compensation for local authorities. My colleagues and I certainly will not be happy until the Government compensate by adding the money into the housing revenues of local authorities that they have been taking away in larger and larger proportions. I shall be interested to see what the figures produce. I urge the Minister to do something much more substantial for the housing needs of those who are not housed at all or who do not have decent accommodation rather than increasing to privatise blocks or parts of blocks of flats.

I support amendment No. 5 in principle. I appreciate the ridiculous conclusion the hon. Member for Eastbourne arrived at in his proper inquiries which clearly led him to the alley from which he is seeking to escape in his amendment. However, a matter of some technicality is involved in the question of the first occupant to exercise the right to buy in the block when there is no other empty property at all, but where it is still possible, given the wording of the amendment, for a valuation to be carried out properly. I appreciate that one can value as though a flat were vacant even when it is occupied, but I fear that there may still be a technical difficulty with the amendment. If that difficulty can be resolved and there are ways of getting a proper valuation, not only should that happen but the valuations should be in the public domain. I hope that the Revenue and the other people involved will respond to the concern expressed in this debate, giving proper information when Members of the House or other people seek it and not hiding behind matters of technicality and obscurity.

Mr. Rooker: The rubbish spoken by people outside after the Committee completed considering clause 1 only showed their ignorance in not even bothering to read the details of our proceedings. We had extensive debates on the difficulty of living in flats, whether deck access or tower block, not all of which are hard to let. There was a substantial difficulty with an imprecise Opposition amendment dealt with at the first sitting of the Committee, but I made it absolutely clear that the Opposition would not act in that way, with a simple alteration of the discount. We still believe that people will not buy what they cannot sell. That is the real issue, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said, there are council blocks of flats on the Edgware road which have been sold piecemeal, with two-bedroom flats on the 16th floor selling at more than £50,000. Of course, London is always different from the rest of the country.

As I said on Second Reading, the Government could make the discount 90 per cent., and there would still be a problem. People would not be able to do what they wanted. The issue can be tackled in other ways, not just by piecemeal selling. However, we concur with the Government's approach to clause 1 because, technically, the clause is now meaningless in terms of its operation.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) identified the difficulty of valuing a property on the open market. I appreciate the fact that district valuers face difficulties, in carrying out structural surveys of homes which are probably designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984. The problem affects many tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of our fellow citizens.

We do not want to hinder progress on this part of the Bill or, indeed, progress on the Bill as a whole, until we become party political shortly. The Government have tried to solve this problem of their defeat on clause 1. They were defeated because hon. Members on both sides of the House searched, blindly, for another way. They did not want simply to jack up discounts piecemeal. They wanted to improve housing for people living in flats, whether they rented or wanted to exercise the right to buy.

Mr. John Patten: I welcome the comments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). Some people did not understand the nature of the debate on clause 1. Anyone interested in it should read the debate in Standing Committee.

I am pleased that Government amendment No. 4 has been welcomed. I am particlarly pleased at the welcome given to it by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr Marlow). To use his immortal words. "The Treasury has come up trumps." I shall pass on his comments to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury who sits with his little calculator in the Treasury looking for opportunities to add things up and, from time to time, to come up trumps. On this occasion, my right hon. Friend has certainly come up trumps, and we are grateful to him.

I made much in Standing Committee of the fact that we do not have any evidence. Lo and behold, from behind me came evidence that I did not have before of a particular problem. I was disturbed by what my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said. I was disturbed at the disgraceful delays in answering correspondence by the Liberal-controlled Eastbourne council on behalf of his constituents. Councils—whether Conservative, Labour or, as in this case, Liberal—should get on with the job of answering letters and looking after the people who live in their areas.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Not the council. It was the district valuer who delayed.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman should have listened more carefully to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. There were delays in answering letters from the council before the district valuer became involved.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman can read the account in Hansard.

I make no promises to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne, but he has given me pause for thought. If he can spare the time to send me the evidence to which he referred, I shall consider further with my noble Friend the Minister of State whether we should make changes in the other place. That is not a pledge to do something in the other place. It is a pledge to look seriously at the evidence of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 1

Land Registration and Related Matters where Right to Buy Preserved

Amendment made: No. 6, in page 79, line 8, at end insert

'and accordingly section 70(1)(k) of that Act (leases which are overriding interests) does not apply.'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

Clause 5

Redevelopment of dwelling-house subject to secure tenancy

Mr. Rooker: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 18, line 3, leave out clause 5.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 10, in page 18, line 14, at end insert

'and for that purpose reasonably requires possession and occupation of the dwelling-house'.

No. 11, in page 18, line 14, at end insert

'provided that possession is not required for the purposes of refurbishment and subsequent sale or re-letting to another person.'.

No. 12, in page 18, line 20, after 'dwelling house' insert

'provided that possession is not required for the purposes of refurbishment and subsequent sale or re-letting to another person'.

No. 13, in page 18, line 25, at beginning insert 'subject to sub-paragraph 4'.

No. 14, in page 18, leave out lines 38 to 41 and insert

'(3) The Secretary of State shall, in giving his approval, consider:

(a) whether the tenants in an area which is the subject of a disposal and re-development scheme have been fully consulted about the proposals;

(b) the views expressed by tenants in an area which is the subject of disposal and redevelopment;

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(c) the likely effect of the disposal of the whole or part of one or more dwelling-houses on an adjacent property;
(d) whether the proposed disposal and redevelopment will lead to a substantial loss of accommodation and;
(e) whether the tenants in an area which is the subject of disposal and redevelopment will have an opportunity of renting one of the developed dwellings at a fair rent or buying at an appropriate price.'.

No. 15, in page 18, line 41, at end insert—

'(4) A landlord may apply to the Secretary of State for consent for the disposal and redevelopment of an area of land consisting of or including the whole or part of one or more dwelling-houses only if

(a) a majority of two-thirds of the tenants of the dwelling-houses have agreed in writing to the proposed scheme, following a consultation period of not less than three months from the point at which full details of the proposed redevelopment have been made available on an individual basis to the tenants concerned; and
(b) the local authority is satisfied that the disposal of the dwelling-houses will not affect its ability to carry out its duties under section 22 of the Housing Act 1985; and
(c) the consideration obtained by the local authority for the disposal of the land would in the opinion of the local authority be more than the vacant site value of the land.'.

Government Amendment No. 16. No. 23, in page 20, line 27, at end add—

'(5) In Part IV of the Housing Act 1985, section 105(3) after the word "demolition" insert "or disposal for redevelopment" and in section 105(3) after the word "situated" add— "or (c) a proposal to consider the disposal and redevelopment of dwelling-houses let under secure tenancies".'

Mr. Rooker: This is the one central clause to which we take fundamental objection. I do not intend to delay the House because I made the case on Second Reading. In Committee, the Opposition refused even to countenance amending clause 5. I spoke for the best part of nearly two hours, and apologised for doing so, giving the arguments why clause 5 should not remain in the Bill. We failed in our task. We tabled modest amendments earlier in the week and since then have tabled and withdrawn others. For the convenience of the House we thought that it was best to have one debate on clause 5 so that hon. Members would have an opportunity to debate the principle of the clause. We are grateful to Mr. Speaker for selecting amendment No. 7 because that will ease our debate.

The clause will give back to 6 million council tenants one-sided tenancy agreements. It will allow the landlords to kick those tenants out simply because they want to get in the home to do it up and sell it off to someone else. When one strips away all the verbiage, that is what the clause is all about. It is about kicking council tenants out —not so that the home can be demolished to remodel the estate or to create access to the land for new building or because the home is substandard, but so that the home can be done up and sold off to someone else. That is immoral. That is not the housing policy we expect from a British Government in the 1980s.

We are not interested in amending clause 5. Essentially, we want it to be deleted. We cannot understand why the Government are not prepared to accept some of our amendments. The provisions in amendments Nos. 10 to 15 would ameliorate some conditions. One Minister said last November on "TV Eye" that the Government were proposing a residual power and that one person should not stand in the way of a development.

During the debate, we gave the example—I repeat it because no one else should be able to argue that we have kept our light under a bushel—of the Labour-controlled Langbaurgh council carrying out this type of measure with 177 dwellings. Three tenants — there were eviction notices on two—were sticking it out because they loved their homes and did not want to move. Under existing law, they may, or may not, have failed in the courts, but, under this legislation, the council would have walked in immediately. The argument was that those homes would remain and were not required for remodelling. The council changed its mind during the passage of the Bill. I take no credit for that. The credit is due to the campaign waged by the three families concerned to show the council that there were other ways of carrying out housing policy.

Clause 5 requires something that can be tested in the courts, so that it is a matter not just of the view of the Secretary of State, but of a test of reasonableness. That is implied in amendment No. 10. At least there would be a further test of what the Government are up to.

Under amendment No. 11, the clause would not operate after rehabilitation if the dwellings concerned were resold to other people.

Amendment No. 14 relates to tenant consultation—as does amendment No. 15—if by a majority of two thirds the tenants have agreed in writing to the proposed scheme. In this way there is some kind of veto for the tenants. I imagine the Minister will come to the House with good news in some respects on clauses 4 and 6. The Minister made concessions in Committee which he confirmed to me in writing today, saying that in another place substantial concessions will be made on clauses 4 and 6. For that, on behalf of the Opposition, I am very grateful, as I know tenants and my hon. Friends will be.

If the Minister can meet us in that way on clauses 4 and 6, why can he not meet us similarly on clause 5 in regard to amendments Nos. 14 and 16? Before 1980 council tenants had no security of tenure. This Tory Government gave tenants security of tenure. If clause 5 is retained in the Bill, it will remove that security of tenure for a wholly spurious and immoral reason. If such homes are to remain, tenants should have the choice to remain in them.

This is the one clause on which I give the firm pledge that, if it stays in the Bill, it will be removed by a Labour Government because we will have no use for it.

9 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I wish to refer to one small point in connection with amendment No. 16, which says:

"1B.—(1) In considering whether to give his approval to a scheme or variation the Secretary of State shall take into account, in particular—

(a) the effect of the scheme on the extent and character of housing accommodation in the neighbourhood,
(b) over what period of time it is proposed that the disposal and redevelopment will take place in accordance with the scheme, and
(c) to what extent the scheme includes provision for housing provided under the scheme to be sold or let to existing tenants or persons nominated by the landlord;"

Will my hon. Friend, when considering whether to give his approval, comment on the extent to which there might be a defective title? I think that our hon. Friend the other Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment touched on this yesterday when he commented that the Government had not ruled out further action. Can my hon. Friend comment on whether he thinks that further legislation might be needed in this respect or whether there might be an amendment in another place to take account of the possibility of a defective title?

This has been the subject of correspondence for nearly a year between me and the Department of the Environment. It started on 29 April last year in connection with my constituents Mr. and Mrs. Stallard of 1 Charnock Drive, Bolton. Correspondence has been exchanged about those constituents and a number of other constituents who are in a similar predicament. Bolton council, it appears, is unique among councils in having so many defective titles and doing so little about them. I shall be grateful, therefore, if my hon. Friend will say whether he thinks that new legislation might be needed, or whether an amendment in another place might take care of the matter.

Mr. Cartwright: I do not wish to rehearse all the arguments that occurred in Standing Committee, but I am still not persuaded that the clause is necessary. I continue to believe that local authorities have a lot of experience of the slow process of voluntarily decanting people when dealing with this kind of problem. It involves a great deal of time, effort and energy, but surely that is the way to go about the problem when, as the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) reminded us in Committee, we are discussing taking people's homes away from them.

My fear, and I think the fear of other hon. Members, is that if this power is given to local authorities to back up what may be a voluntary process to begin with they might be tempted to short-circuit the voluntary process and have early recourse to any legal powers that they may be given. Although the Minister tried to persuade us in Committee that there would be legal protection for tenants, and that tenants who were not happy with the alternative housing would have the protection of the courts, that does not adequately cover the problem of tenants who will suddenly be thrust into the frightening process of appearing in the courts and arguing the issues.

The clause will in a sense play into the hands of the Bill's oponents. Earlier this week the Minister talked about the scare stories which are circulating on council estates about the impact of the clause. That is the price that he will have to pay if he sticks to this approach. So long as this power is left in the Bill, such stories will be told. That is a tragedy, because there are many useful provisions in the legislation. Unfortunately, they will be swept away in the reaction to the shorthand headline approach that will flow from the inclusion of clause 5.

The Minister has gone some way to try to meet the points about consultation and about giving tenants real power. Amendment No. 16 is barely a form of consultation. Certainly it gives no power to tenants who want to express their view on the possibility of losing their homes. I endorse everything that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) has said. If we must have clause 5, we must ask that alongside it there is real and genuine protection for tenants to ensure that such power cannot be exercised against the will of the majority of the people involved.

Mr. Raynsford: The clause is objectionable. It removes security of tenure, effectively to facilitate privatisation. In my constituency the Fulham Court estate is subject to exactly this process at the moment. That example illustrates the position that will be created if the clause is put into effect.

Fulham Court is an estate of about 370 dwellings. It was built in the 1930s. It was attractive and popular at the time, but it has been allowed to fall into decay. I do not wish to make a party point about it. I suspect that both parties which have controlled Hammersmith and Fulham council have in their own ways neglected the estate. The tragedy is that, rather than accept the need to try to put things right and to look after the interests of the tenants, whose needs have been neglected for many years, the current council —a Conservative council held in power by Liberals, an interesting combination—has, in a Pontius Pilate-like style, washed its hands of Fulham Court and decided to sell the estate.

The council started with a process of consultation with the tenants. This is an interesting example of the value of the consultation proposed by the Government. Consultation took place. The council said that it was considering selling to non-profit making bodies. That was the basis of the consultation. The response of the tenants was clear and unequivocal. They did not want disposal of their homes; they wanted the council to live up to its responsibilities and improve the estate for them. A large majority of the tenants said that they did not want the estate to be disposed of.

The council disregarded the wishes of the tenants and proceeded with a proposal to dispose of the estate. It gave priority to decanting people from the estate into available lettings in the authority. As a result, many other people who are in extreme need have not been given housing to which they should have had access. Recently I have been giving advice to tenants who are statutorily overcrowded and who have been advised by the authority that it cannot house them. It is a sad comment on the attitude of an authority when it gives priority to decanting people to enable privatisation to take place, rather than meeting the needs of the people who are statutorily overcrowded.

The estate was gradually vacated, but only one block was vacated in total. With the local authority elections pending, the Conservative councillors suspected that they would lose control of the council and sought to pre-empt any decision by a future council to take a different course of action. The council sought to impose on the sale of that one vacant block a covenant which would require a future council to dispose of the rest of the estate by sale. That covenant was rejected by the housing association. I must declare an interest, because at the time I was a member of the committee of the housing association which had previously wished to buy one block on the estate for shared ownership. The association would not proceed on those discreditable terms.

Did the local authority pay attention? No, it did not. The response by the local authority was to say that it would try to sell and dispose of the properties to private developers. The council has agreed to dispose of the estate, not to a non-profit-making body, which was the basis of the consultation, but to Barratts, a company which is most emphatically profit-making. I should add that during a period over two years ago when Barratts was rather over-committed to timber framed housing, it was not making as much profit as it would have liked. In principle, Barratts is not a non-profit-making body.

That is a measure of the value of consultation by a Conservative-controlled council seeking to privatise. The councillors have demonstrated their contempt for the tenants of Fulham Court. The council has ignored the wishes of the tenants, who did not want the estate to be privatised. It has shown a gross breach of faith by changing the basis of the sale from a sale to a non-profit-making body to one to a profit-making company, and it has shown a contempt for the democratic process by attempting to bind the hands of a future council to proceed with sales.

Throughout this period the estate has been allowed to go to rack and ruin, and more and more properties have been left empty. It rings pretty hollow to hear the Minister talk about empty properties when we hear about a council which is deliberately leaving 200 houses empty. That represents more than the number of homeless families in Hammersmith and Fulham who are presently living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. Those houses are being left empty while the council pursues its objective of sale for privatisation.

One of the tenants has been able to get redress by seeking a judicial review in the High Court and obtaining an injunction to restrain the council from proceeding with the sale in the meantime. If this clause had been in effect, that remedy would not have been available and the tenants of Fulham Court not only would have had their wishes ignored, but would have been evicted. The clause will do nothing to help people who need houses. It will exacerbate the sort of problems that I have described and will open the door to exploitation of tenants. I urge hon. Members to reject the clause.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Political retribution of a type came my way during the by-election for the Fulham constituency at which the hon. Gentleman was the victor. I went along incognito, as it were, to ask what I could do to help. I was given a load of leaflets to deliver and, as it happens, I was asked to distribute them in the Fulham Court estate. I had some dealings with my colleagues on the local council about that estate and know all about it. I went round the estate on a sunny and pleasant afternoon not long before the by-election took place.

My comments are as strong as those that have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). The clause is the worst part of the Bill, and if the Government want the Bill to have a favourable reception outside they have no option but to remove it. The clause takes away protection for tenants. We made that point on Second Reading. As the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) has said, the consultation process is never adequate unless it gives power to people. The problem with consultation is that it always retains power for local authorities. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said, if this power is given to local authorities it will override the right of security of tenure given by the Government to tenants in council property. I give all credit to the Government for giving tenants that right. In this case and in others — Langbaurgh and Tower Hamlets are other examples—that right is under threat.

If ever an experience was destined to make one firm in one's view that the clause ought to be resisted, it was the experience that I had when I went to Fulham Court estate and to many similar estates in my constituency and found that the community feeling was so strong that people were determined not to give in with any degree of willingness. They deserve to be supported in their right not to give in. I understand that the procedures followed by the local council meant ultimately that the proposal, as it was before the application for the judicial review, was that there would be a sale of only those blocks which by then had been vacated and that the rest were not to be sold. Therefore, the picture was not as black as was sometimes painted by the hon. Member for Fulham and his colleagues. None the less, an issue of principle was raised, and there was criticism of Members of this House, both Labour and Conservative.

I beseech the Minister to say that his amendment is not sufficient to recognise the strength of feeling and the strength of view expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich and by myself, reinforcing what was said by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, speaking for the Labour party. We would be committed to removing the clause if it went into the legislation, and I hope to persuade the Minister that to legislate in this way, albeit for a short period, might be misleading to those who would be affected and harmful to the rights of people to stay in their homes if they wish to do so.

9.15 pm

Mr. John Patten: I regret that this must be my longest speech this evening. This is an important issue and it is important that I set it out clearly.

Can I begin by dealing with the important issue of Bolton. My hon. Friend from Bolton North-East, (Mr. Thurnham) with his characteristic energy and ingenuity, was able to put Bolton into this debate and I think he is right to raise it. In Bolton, as elsewhere in the country, the problems which he raises in respect of the amendment, which he has admirably drafted, are complex and raise difficult technical issues relating to the rights of third parties, and I do not regard this Bill as a suitable vehicle for pursuing the point further.

I hope what my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) said yesterday, in answer to questions, will satisfy my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) this evening, because there is a strong feeling in the Committee that we must make progress on the main elements in this particular debate.

We are looking seriously at this issue, but I do not think that I can conceivably make any amendments during the progress of this Bill, although I do deplore the way in which Bolton council is delaying so seriously people's rightful aspirations to exercise their right to buy.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): This is a difficult question. I am glad that my hon. Friend has accepted that it is an important one. Could he not go a little further? So far, he has ruled out the possibility of dealing with this in the course of this Bill in the other place. I would ask him to leave it open, because I doubt whether it is as complicated as some people think. I did have something to do with it when I was a Law Officer, and I would ask him to undertake to look at the formula in clause 13 before the other House parts with it.

Mr. Patten: Who am I to resist the blandishments of my right hon. and learned Friend? I am not going to give an undertaking to him or my hon. Friend to do anything in another place. If they wish to write to me further and in greater detail about this point, I will consider it further. But for the avoidance of doubt, that is not an undertaking to do something in another place but is an undertaking to look at the possibilities of doing something in another place. With that I hope we can leave the important issues of Bolton. What a political cockpit Bolton is. When I go to Bolton I get scragged by the local council—a very rough lot. I mean Labour Members on the local council.

So far as the main element of this debate is concerned, I understand the strength of feeling of the hon. Gentleman for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on this issue, and I listened to him for two hours upstairs in Committee in a long and powerful speech. I think that clause 5 has been wrongly misrepresented as a wholesale attack on the security of tenure and I think that it is bizarre in the extreme to suggest that it is such. It is nothing of the kind. Its purpose is to remove certain anomalies in the powers of local authorities, and other public sector landlords, to improve their housing stock. That is how I prefer to see it, and that is what I think the reality of the situation is.

At the moment private landlords can obtain possession of their property when they can provide suitable alternative accommodation under present powers.

Councils can also do so because public sector landlords of secure tenants can already seek possession of their dwellings on the grounds that they wish to redevelop the property. There are, therefore, two clear precedents for what is made possible in clause 5. The only situation in which it is not possible to do it is when property is being transferred from public to private ownership—which is not always a bad or an evil thing.

Under present legislation, landlords can also make home loss payments to long-standing tenants who move within the public sector, but they cannot make those home loss payments when there is a transfer disposal from the public to the private sector, and that inability to make home loss payments has been a major obstacle to a number of local authorities, both Labour and Tory, in their attempts to bring dilapidated stock into better condition.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr referred to the "TV Eye" programme last November on which my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton appeared. As my hon. Friend then said, these anomalies could, on a very limited number of occasions, hinder councils that wished to bring private sector funds into the refurbishment of run-down estates.

What happened in Langbaurgh was very unfortunate. The Opposition know my views about that; I made them quite clear in Committee. It was wrong that a single tenant could block a desirable scheme which, after due consideration, all the other tenants wanted. There must be a balance between security of tenure and the possession of one's home, and the benefit of the greater number of people who wish for a change.

In Standing Committee, after some debate, I was persuaded that the factors that the Secretary of State should take into consideration in deciding whether to give approval for a scheme should be spelt out in the Bill. Persuasive arguments were deployed by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and by Labour Members. I had already announced some of the issues that I envisaged would be taken into account, but I think that they must be stated in the Bill. Amendment No. 16 is therefore designed to spell out the factors to be taken into account. Opposition Members will wish to be assured that the scheme must be a viable one which will result in the improvement of housing. The Secretary of State will ensure that that is so. He will make sure that the tenants have been properly consulted. I have already stated that I would consider giving tenants a statutory right of individual consultations on proposals for which the new ground is to be used. Landlords will have to take tenants' views into account before seeking the approval of the Secretary of State.

This speech must necessarily be rather long, because of the sensitivity of the issues.

Hon. Members who expressed concern about individual consultations will be pleased to see that the amendment will give tenants that right. I am glad to see that organisations such as Age Concern have given what they call a cautious welcome to the additional safeguards in amendment No. 16.

I expect that only a very few cases relying on the proposed new ground will come to court, but only the court can grant a possession order. It is important that that should be clear. It is unfair and wrong to say that clause 5 introduces the right for councils to kick tenants out at will. That is not true.

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The court will need to be satisfied that the re-development scheme has the Secretary of State's approval, that the scheme will proceed reasonably quickly, and that suitable alternative accommodation can be found. I shall put on record what I have put in writing to the hon. Member for Perry Barr. I refer to the two amendments that I am unable to move this evening. We shall move them in the other place, and the amendments to clauses 4 and 6 will give effect to the veto that the hon. Gentleman desires. I am happy to give that undertaking, and I shall place a copy of my letter to him in the Library. I sense that it is not the wish of the House to hear it read out word for word.

In conclusion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is always good to be praised by one's own side for one's phrases. But the provisions introduced by the clause will assist public-sector landlords in tackling their rundown estates for the general improvement of the housing stock, while at the same time providing adequate safeguards for tenants. It is perfectly fair for the Labour party, Social Democratic party or Liberal party to campaign against the Bill, to campaign in particular against clause 5 or to inform tenants that they think that the clause is wrong, is against their interests and may do them damage. But I ask them not to scaremonger in their party political propaganda and to give the impression that clause 5 allows the "turfing out" of tenants at will. That is completely and utterly wrong. Any propaganda to that effect is a straightforward lie, and it will be put right by me and my fellow Ministers whenever we have the opportunity.

The Opposition amendments would leave the anomalies that I have described unchanged, and would mean that the opportunity was missed to make a minor change that would help local authorities in their difficult task. I reject their amendments. I wish to strengthen the safeguards for tenants as requested by both sides of the Committee, and am happy to commend amendment No. 16.

Mr. Rooker: The Opposition never said that clause 5 would allow councils to kick out tenants at will. But I make no bones about it: the clause gives councils the right to remove tenants from their homes solely for the purpose of doing them up and selling them off. That is the long and the short of it. If the clause remains in the Bill, 5 million or 6 million families will be unsure whether they can sleep easily in their beds, not knowing whether their council will go in for a scheme that could force them out of their homes.

I have been in the home of a tenant who wanted to stay there. The home was perfectly OK. Somebody knocked on that tenant's door and said, "Why are you still living here? This home is going to be mine. On the plot in the estate agent's office on the site, your plot number, your home, is going to be mine." Imagine how someone feels when that happens, yet that happened in Langbaurgh. It could be repeated up and down the country if the clause remains in the Bill. I do not blame the Minister for saying that he did not want to read out the whole of his letter. We are extremely grateful to the Minister for his concession in relation to clauses 4 and 6. But he said:

"You will see that this arrangement will give tenants an effective right of veto where the majority are opposed to a disposal of tenanted property or to a management agreement."

That is what we asked for, and we are extremely grateful. But why cannot the tenants have the same sort of veto in relation to clause 5?

9.30 pm

We are not opposed to private money being spent to do up rundown estates where there are vast numbers of empty council flats. We have made that clear. We are not opposed to tenants being persuaded of offered something better to move into to facilitate such development. We are not opposed to tenants being moved from their homes under existing law where estates are being remodelled to provide decent roads, proper gardens and proper front paths.

We are opposed to tenants being moved out simply so that their home can be done up and sold off. It is that central point that we are opposed to, none of the others. That is something that the Government's amendment and the Minister's speech do not seem to meet.

Mr. John Patten: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's assurance that the Opposition do not think that the bringing of private funds into the public sector is a bad thing. Would the hon. Gentleman undertake—as much as it is possible for him to control his support as it is for us to control our supporters—to do everything he can to prevent Labour party literature containing allegations that clause 5 makes large-scale evictions possible and makes it possible for tenants to be turfed out of their homes. That literature is being circulated in London at present in the local government campaigns. It is doing much harm and stirring up many unnecessary fears in people's minds.

Mr. Rooker: I do not think that the Minister appreciates the problem. The majority of clauses in the Bill would be accepted by every hon. Member because they are not related to the contentious parts of housing or planning. I am not talking about the Bill. We object to clause 5. I do not have any control—I do not think that anybody in the House does—over what our individual candidates say or do. All I seek to do is tell the truth.

I have sought to explain what is wrong with clause 5. I have sought to explain what we have tried to do to amend it and I have also tried to show what can happen if clause 5 stays in the Bill as it is now. I make no bones about it. I have used Langbaurgh as an example. It is a good example, because it shows the naked reality of clause 5 and how the security of tenancy is under threat.

I do not want to repeat what I have said. My constituents are not subject to that at the moment and neither, perhaps, are my hon. Friends. However, there is no political monopoly in seeking to kick tenants out of their homes. It has happened under Labour-controlled councils as well. I do not want council tenants to be removed from the homes they wish to stay in simply so that the homes can be done up and sold off to somebody else. I do not think that any of my hon. Friends do either.

We want this clause removed from the Bill. In the absence of that, at the very minimum, we want something like that contained in amendment 15 put into the Bill to strengthen the operation of the clause.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendment No. 15 proposed, in page 18, line 41, [Clause 5], at end insert—

'(4) A landlord may apply to the Secretary of State for consent for the disposal and redevelopment of an area of land consisting of or including the whole or part of one or more dwelling-houses only if

(a) a majority of two-thirds of the tenants of the dwelling-houses have agreed in writing to the proposed scheme, following a consultation period of not less than three months from the point at which full details of the proposed redevelopment have been made available on an individual basis to the tenants concerned; and

(b) the local authority is satisfied that the disposal of the dwelling-houses will not affect its ability to carry out its duties under section 22 of the Housing Act 1985; and

(c) the consideration obtained by the local authority for the disposal of the land would in the opinion of the local authority be more than the vacant site value of the land.'.—[Mr. Rooker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House if we take Government amendments formally in blocks, as we come to them, and non-Government amendments as we reach them on the Order Paper.

Amendments made:—

No. 16, in page 18, line 41, at end insert—

'1A.—(1) Where a landlord proposes to apply to the Secretary of State for the approval or variation of a scheme, it shall serve a notice in writing on any secure tenant of a dwelling-house affected by the proposal stating—

(a) the main features of the proposed scheme or, as the case may be, the scheme as proposed to be varied,

(b) that the landlord proposes to apply to the Secretary of State for approval of the scheme or variation, and

(c) the effect of such approval, by virtue of section 84 and ground 10A in Part II of this Schedule, in relation to proceedings for possession of the dwelling-house, and informing the tenant that he may, within such period as the landlord may allow (which shall be at least 28 days from service of the notice), make representations to the landlord about the proposal.

(2) The landlord shall not apply to the Secretary of State until it has considered any representations made to it within that period.

(3) In the case of a landlord to which section 105 applies (consultation on matters of housing management) the provisions of this paragraph apply in place of the provisions of that section in relation to the approval or variation of a redevelopment scheme.

1B.—(1) In considering whether to give his approval to a scheme or variation the Secretary of State shall take into account, in particular—

(a) the effect of the scheme on the extent and character of housing accommodation in the neighbourhood,

(b) over what period of time it is proposed that the disposal and redevelopment will take place in accordance with the scheme, and

(c) to what extent the scheme includes provision for housing provided under the scheme to be sold or let to existing tenants or persons nominated by the landlord ;

and he shall take into account any representations made to him and, so far as they are brought to his notice, any representations made to the landlord.

(2) The landlord shall give to the Secretary of State such information as to the representations made to it, and other relevant matters, as the Secretary of State may require.'.

No. 20 in page 19, line 29, leave out from 'include' to end of line 30 and insert

"any authority or body within section 80 (the landlord condition for secure tenancies) having an interest of any description in the dwelling-house.'.—[Mr. Durant.]

Clause 6

MANAGEMENT AGREEMENTS

Amendment made: No. 24, in page 21, line 33, leave out 'co-operative housing association' and insert

'housing association of which at least half the members are tenants of dwelling-houses subject to the agreement, at least half the tenants of the dwelling-houses are members of the association and the proposed assignee is not, and is not willing to become, a member of the association.'.—[Mr. Durant.]

Clause 7

EXTENSION OF ASSURED TENANCIES SCHEME TO CASES WHERE WORKS HAVE BEEN CARRIED OUT

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 24, line 8, at end insert—

'(3) In section 57(1) of the Housing Act 1980 after "section 56(4) of the Act, then" insert "(subject to subsection (2) below."

(4) In section 57(2) of the Housing Act 1980, at end insert—

"(b) the landlord under an assured tenancy has ceased to be an approved body by reason of unacceptability; and".'.

This amendment relates to assured tenancies and to the need for there to be protection if the landlord ceases to be in the category of an approved landlord in the context of the relationship between the landlord and tenant under the approved tenancy scheme. If at the moment tenants remain under the assured tenure regime, in certain circumstances they lose, not by virtue of anything they do but by virtue of the change in the status of the landlord and the loss of approval given to the landlord. Tenants are thus in a new and vulnerable position instead of having any continuing protection.

The amendment seeks to continue that protection, because it changes the status of the tenant if the tenancy has ceased to be held under a landlord who is an approved body, that landlord having lost that approval by virtue of his unacceptability. Although I was not present in the Committee, I have read what was said and the Minister will remember that a considerable debate took place about the bounds of the assured tenancy scheme. One of the areas of concern about the assured tenancy scheme was the risk when the approved landlord did not continue to have that approval for various reasons.

I seek to give a slightly greater protection than presently exists as one of the ways of reflecting the general concern about the weaknesses in the assured tenancy scheme. From reading the evidence of the Committee, I understand that the Minister accepts that there are some weaknesses.

Mr. John Patten: I presume that the Liberal party accepts the idea of the assured tenancy scheme and its extension being a good thing, because that was said by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) during the Committee stage of the Bill.

Mr. Hughes: Our view is that with the right protection the assured tenancy scheme can be continued, but we did not say explicitly that as it presently stands we accept it. I have read what my hon. Friend said in Committee and he did not give other than a cautious and qualified welcome to the proposals the Government said they intended to bring forward. I ask the Minister to add to the protection of tenants when the landlord ceases to have the status of acceptability. The proposal puts a landlord into the specific and limited status of being a landlord under the assured tenenacy scheme. I hope the Minister will be sympathetic.

Mr. John Patten: Landlords who have their approval withdrawn are already prevented under the assured tenancy legislation from creating any further assured tenancies, as I am sure that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) knows. The effect of this amendment would be to deprive them of their existing assured tenancies, presumably by converting them into tenancies to which the Rent Acts would apply. That is my reading of the hon. Gentleman's mind, and he can say whether that is correct. We do not believe that it is right to penalise landlords in this way in respect of their existing assured tenancy lettings. The power of the Secretary of State to grant and withdraw approval is widely drawn.

[Mr. John Patten]

The hon. Member for Woolwich has said that he looks to approved bodies such as building societies and other responsible institutions as being involved in this form of assured tenancy. The amendment could place doubt in the mind of an approved body about the position of an assured tenancy's lettings if the Government policy were to change. The hon. Member for Woolwich has recognised specifically the need for stability and the need not to put off responsible institutions. I believe that an approved body needs reasonable certainty. Having once created an assured tenancy that tenancy will be allowed to continue, otherwise the person involved has no protection for his investment and, in this case, almost always that person will actually be a large investing institution such as a building society, the Housing Corporation, and housing associations, which are also interested. If that certainty is put in doubt, as it would be by the amendment, the practical effect would be to discourage investment. That would be a great mistake. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister did not address my specific concern and, therefore, I am not assured or satisfied by his response. I am concerned when landlords lose their acceptable status. I do not seek to put off people from becoming landlords under the scheme, but there are circumstances in which the landlord does not come within the category or would lose his acceptable status. I hope that the Minister will think again. I am prepared at this stage to give him a chance to do so in the hope that the matter will be dealt with in the other place. In that hope, I seek leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Housing and Planning Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that Government Amendments Nos. 28 to 30 are to be moved formally.

Mr. Fraser: On Government amendments Nos. 28 and 30——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House agreed to take the Government amendments formally. I think that the hon. Member was here when that was done. I am afraid that we cannot go back on that decision. I shall repeat the amendments—Government amendments Nos. 28, 29, 30 and 31 to be moved formally. The question is that the amendments be made.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not clear whether the hon. Member wishes to divide on an amendment. If so, I need to know on which amendment he wishes to divide the House.

Mr. Ron Davies: Government Amendment No. 28, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall put the question on Government Amendment No. 28.

Clause 10

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS; REPEALS

Amendment proposed: No. 28, in page 26, line 6, at the end insert—

'(ca) the deferment of completion in pursuance of the right to buy;'.—[Mr. Kenneth Baker.]

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The House proceeded to a Division; but no Member being willing to act as teller for the Noes, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Ayes had it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am anxious to meet the convenience of the House. I understand that we should now take formally the Government amendments and any amendments that have been discussed and merely pause on the other amendments. If there are any objections to that course, we shall not follow it. The House appears to agree, so we shall proceed on that basis.

Amendments made: No. 29, in page 26, line 9, at end insert—

'(da) the recovery of service charges in respect of the cost of grant-aided works;'.

No. 30, in page 82, line 49 [Schedule 2], at end insert—

'DEFERMENT OF COMPLETION IN PURSUANCE OF RIGHT TO BUY

3A.—(1) In sections 140(3)(c) and 152(3) of the Housing Act 1985 (period before notice to complete can be served where tenant entitled to defer completion) for "two years" substitute "three years".

(2) In sections 142(1)(c), (2) and (5) and 151(3) of that Act for "£100" (the amount which the tenant must deposit in order to be entitled to defer completion) substitute "£150".'.

(3) The above amendments apply where notice under section 142(1) of that Act claiming to be entitled to defer completion is served after the commencement of this paragraph.

(4) The above amendments to sections 140(3)(c), 142(5), 151(3) and 152(3) also apply where notice under section 142(1) of that Act claiming to be entitled to defer completion was served before the commencement of this paragraph if the tenant—

(a) serves a further notice on the landlord claiming the benefit of the longer period, and

(b) at the same time deposits with the landlord an additional £50;

and section 142(5) applies to the sum so deposited as if it had been deposited in pursuance of a notice under that section.

(5) No such further notice may be served if the landlord has already served a notice under section 140 or 152 of the Housing Act 1985 (landlord's first notice to complete).

(6) The following provisions of the Housing Act 1985 apply, as to provisions of Part V of that Act, to the provisions of this paragraph relating to a further notice or deposit—section 170 (assistance in connection with legal proceedings), section 176 (form and service of notices), section 177 (errors and omisions in notices), section 180 (statutory declarations), section 181 (jurisdiction of county court).'.

No. 31, in page 83, line 14 [Schedule 2], at end insert—

'SERVICE CHARGES IN RESPECT OF THE COST OF GRANT-AIDED WORKS

4A.—(1) In the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, after section 20 insert—

Limitation of service charges: grant-aided works

20A. Where relevant costs are incurred or to be incurred on the carrying out of works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV of the Housing Act 1985 (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion), the amount of the grant shall be deducted from the costs and the amount of the service charge payable shall be reduced accordingly.".

(2) In section 21 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 (request for summary of relevant costs), in subsection (5) (contents of summary) after "shall" insert "state whether any of the costs relate to works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV of the Housing Act (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion) and".

(3) In section 47 of the Housing Act 1985 (limitation on service charges payable after disposal of house by public sector authority), after subsection (3) add—

"(4) Where relevant costs are incurred or to be incurred on the carrying out of works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion), the amount of the grant shall be deducted from the costs and the amount of the service charge payable shall be reduced accordingly.".

(4) In section 48 of the Housing Act 1985 (request for summary of relevant costs), after subsection (3) (contents of summary) insert—

"(3A) The summary shall also state whether any of the costs relate to works in respect of which a grant has been or is to be paid under Part XV (grants for works of improvement, repair or conversion)".'.—[Mr. Kenneth Baker.]

Clause 11

SIMPLIFIED PLANNING ZONES IN ENGLAND AND WALES

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 27, line 2, leave out 'shall' and insert 'may'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following: Amendment No. 33, in page 27, line 6, leave out 'shall' and insert 'may'.

No. 34, in page 27, line 8, leave out 'shall' and insert 'may'.

No. 41, in page 89, line 4 [Schedule 3], at end insert—

'(c) the local planning authority in non-metropolitan counties, as designated in section 11 Part (6), has determined that, in accordance with the options available to it in this Act, it does not require or intend that any of the area for which it is the planning authority be designated as a Simplified Planing Zone.'.

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and other of my hon. Friends are not able to be present because they are consulting the King of Spain.

The amendments relate to important matters that affect Dorset in particular but the south of England in general. We are not against the principle of simplified planning zones. Indeed, these are appropriate and right for metropolitan areas.

The concern behind the amendments is that the simplified planning zones might lead to the suit of a developer, particularly with the connivance of a Government less favourable to the environment of the country than this Government, and might enforce simplified planning zones upon such areas in a way that would be inappropriate.

The Minister has tabled a number of amendments to try to take account of these objections, but I must tell him that Wimborne district council tells me in a letter that in its view the amendments do not go far enough. It says:

"whilst there may be some reluctance from Central Government to use the Power of Direction, it is considered to be an important element which would no doubt be used to override local considerations in unspecified circumstances."

What the Bill does in clause 11 is take away to a limited extent the power of the local authority over its own area in relation to these simplified planning zones. I, like all of us, am very concerned about the environment, and the state of the environment is much more potent an issue today than it was, as my hon. Friend will know. This is right and understandable.

The amendments leave the decisions on exclusions to the Minister, not to the local authority. That is the source of the concern. I think the particular concern is highlighted in amendment No. 41. That is the key because it makes it clear that only in metropolitan areas at the suit of a complainant — and I have in mind particularly a developer — can the Minister override what the local authority say.

If we do not have some protection in rural areas that are already suffering from over-development, with a Government that are less favourably inclined to rural areas, we might have a continuation of the over-development which I think no hon. Member would wish to see.

I hope that my hon. Friend will look favourably on the amendments. As I have said, the key is in amendment No. 41. I look forward to what he has to say about the protection of the rural environment and the environment of the south of England, about which all of us who are signatories to the amendment are concerned.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the hon. Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker). As the Bill is drafted, it requires local authorities to accept simplified planning zones both in concept and reality. The effect of the amendments would be that a local authority should not be required to accept a simplified planning zone but that the decision should be retained locally. The hon. Gentleman referred to Wimborne, so there are pressures in rural areas just as much as elsewhere; often there are more pressures in the south of England. There is pressure particularly in and around the green belt, although that may not apply so much to the district to which the hon. Gentleman referred. When there are pressures, it is appropriate for the local authority to decide whether to give additional planning advantage to people who wish to develop. Otherwise, there is a terrible risk that there will be an incentive for the wrong sort of development which would be out of keeping with the surrounding area.

The Government should accept that there could easily be abuse of the powers that they are seeking to give themselves but which should properly be left with local government. The amendment is simple. I hope that the Government will accept that they need not go as far as they are at present minded to do.

Mr. Tracey: As the night wears on too close to Friday, I hesitate to take too many liberties with the House, but I should register the Government's misgivings about the amendments and also put on record some assurances.

The amendments would have a negative effect on the provisions in the Bill which enable local planning authorities to set up simplified planning zone schemes. They would remove certain duties placed on local planning authorities. Amendment No. 32 would make it optional rather than obligatory for authorities to give initial consideration to the desirability of SPZs in their areas. Similarly, amendment No. 33 would make it optional rather than obligatory for authorities to keep that question under review. Amendment No. 34 would also remove the duty placed on authorities to prepare schemes when they have determined that it would be desirable to do so. This action too would become optional under the proposed amendment.

Amendment No. 41 figured particularly in my hon. Friend's speech. The House should note that that amendment applies only to non-metrcpolitan district local planning authorities. Perhaps there is partisan thought behind it. It would not bite on the London Boroughs or on other metropolitan districts. I take it that the concern behind the amendment is to prevent simplified planning zone schemes from being set up in the less urban and rural parts of the country against the wishes of the planning authority.

As regards the Secretary of State's powers of direction, which seem to be the main source of worry to my hon. Friends from the shires, these powers of direction are already limited to such cases as are referred to my right hon. Friend. Without referrals, my right hon. Friend cannot take action to make authorities prepare schemes. Even if he were minded to use the provision, it would be subject to obtaining the views of the authority. Where a scheme had to be prepared it would be subject to the full procedures of public participation and consultation, including a public local inquiry, if necessary.

There are adequate and fair provisions to protect against unsuitable schemes being set up. My hon. Friends from the shire counties have made a fair attempt to amend the Bill, but we cannot accept the amendments. I urge my hon. Friend to seek to withdraw them.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I must make it clear that in putting forward the amendments my hon. Friends and I were not proposing a protective, Conservative, backward-looking measure. We seek to protect the environment of the south of England. We also seek to encourage development, but we may not all share the same views about how that should be done. We need to push development, especially in the north and in the extremities of the south of England. We are all agreed that derelict areas and parts of our cities need development. This is not a reactionary move at all. The quality of the environment is precious and must be protected. We are also anxious about the status of local authorities and the strength of local government. I accept what my hon. Friend said about the weakening of the responsibilities of local authorities implicit in amendments Nos. 32, 33 and 34.

My anxiety is reflected in amendment No. 41, but I propose to take the assurances that my hon. Friend has given as his undertaking. I have seen his colleagues from the Department of the Environment, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The idea that they would try to force local authorities in rural non metropolitan areas where simplified planning zones would be totally inappropriate to accept them against their will and against the wishes of a public inquiry is unthinkable. I accept that my hon. Friends would never do such a thing. Let us be careful that we never have a Government that might seek to override local authorities in an undemocratic and undesirable way. On the basis of the assurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 13

POWER TO GIVE ASSISTANCE

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I beg to move amendment No. 66, in page 31, line 8, after 'environment', insert

', providing employment for people who live in the area.'.

I think mine is the only non-Government amendment between now and Third Reading so I shall try to detain hon. Members as little as possible. This amendment was partially inspired by the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) in Committee. He quite rightly drew attention in Committee to the importance of local employment prospects as a condition of Government grants.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr stressed that it was important that expenditure incurred under the powers of Part 3 should provide jobs for local residents. In reply, my hon. Friend the Minister expressed his sympathy for the idea of that amendment, but he quite properly drew attention to the difficulty of introducing any legal requirements. In Committee, I said that it would be difficult to enshrine a statutory requirement to provide local jobs. Backbenchers sometimes feel impelled, if I may use a slightly hackneyed phrase, to rush in where Ministers fear to tread. The creation of jobs for local people is one of the objectives of urban regeneration. The word "employment" does not occur in the introduction to part III of the Bill and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will sympathetically consider my amendment.

My hon. Friend the Minister is responsible for a number of initiatives which have important employment benefits. I mention the community refurbishing scheme, under which unemployed local people work on turning round conditions on council estates. This approach should be more widely adopted, and I hope that my hon. Friend will accept this approach, which is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. John Patten: We often pay compliments to one another in the House, sometimes rather excessively, just as we attack each other rather too excessively. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has been tireless in his constructive contributions to this debate and in Standing Committee, and in his attempts to improve the Bill. We have found some of his amendments easier to accept than others. I have from time to time been defeated by him in Standing Committee, and I shall seek my revenge at a later stage in some other forum.

I believe that once again my hon. Friend has come up with a formulation which will improve the Bill. It reflects the general wishes of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), and I pay tribute to the force with which my hon. Friend deployed those arguments. His amendment strikes the right balance and reflects an all-party agreement to try to do more for employment in these areas. It recognises the general will of Parliament, without taking us into the difficult territory of imposing mandatory requirements. I have great pleasure in accepting it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 17

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

Amendments made: No. 67, in page 33, line 34, at end insert 'or is only required'.

No. 68, in page 38, line 40, at end insert—

'Grants of hazardous substances consent without compliance with conditions previously attached

58EE. — (1) This section applies to an application for hazardous substances consent without a condition subject to which a previous hazardous substances consent was granted.

(2) On such an application the hazardous substances authority shall consider only the question of the conditions subject to which hazardous substances consent should be granted, and—

[Mr. John Patten]

(a) if they determine that hazardous substances consent should be granted subject to conditions differing from the subject to which the previous consent was granted, or that it should be granted unconditionally, they shall grant hazardous substances consent accordingly; and

(b) if they determine that hazardous substances consent should be granted subject to the same conditions as those subject to which the previous consent was granted, they shall refuse the application.

(3) Where—

(a) hazardous substances consent has been granted or is deemed to have been granted for the presence on, over or under land of more than one hazardous substance; and

(b) an application under this section does not relate to all the substances, the hazardous substances authority shall only have regard to any condition relating to a substance to which the application does not relate to the extent that it has implications for a substance to which the application does relate.

(4) Where—

(a) more than one hazardous substances consent has been granted or is deemed to have been granted in respect of the same land; and

(b) an application under this section does not relate to all the consents, the hazardous substances authority shall only have regard to any consent to which the application does not relate to the extent that it has implications for consent to which the application does relate.

(5) Regulations may make provision in relation to applications under this section corresponding to any provision that may be made by regulations under section 58B above in relation to applications for hazardous substances consent.'

No. 69, in page 39, line 2, leave out from 'that' to end of line 4 and insert—

'(a) there has been a material change of use of land to which a hazardous substances consent relates; or

(b) planning permission has been granted for development the carrying out of which would involve a material change of use of such land and the development to which the permission relates has been commenced,'.

No. 70, in page 39, leave out lines 11 to 21 and insert—

'(2) The hazardous substances authority may by order—

(a) revoke a hazardous substances consent which relates to only one substance if it appears to them that that substance has not for at least 5 years been present on, under or over the land to which the consent relates in a quantity equal to or exceeding the controlled quantity; and

(b) revoke a hazardous substances consent which relates to a number of substances if it appears to them that none of those substances has for at least 5 years been so present.'.

No. 71, in page 40, line 37, at end insert—

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. John Patten.]

10.23 pm

Mr. John Fraser: We have debated the Bill vigorously, especially clause 5 and other objectionable provisions, but on other clauses we have acted constructively. We hope to see legislation on the Nugee committee recommendations absolutely guaranteed next Session. We have secured some improvements in the law on improvement grants for flats and we have made a significant contribution to co-operative involvement by tenants. We welcome those parts of clause 6 which will give tenants a greater say in their management and greater control over their environment.

We have opposed those parts of clause 6 which were aimed simply at private management for private profit, but the Government amendment, which they hope to reinforce in another place, will virtually guarantee council tenants a veto on privatisation over their heads.

A number of matters which should be in the Bill are not. It represents missed opportunities, because it is largely about the management, rather than the provision, of housing. Our criticisms, not least in the debate on Tuesday, of the gross inadequacy of housing provision remain as forceful as ever. The Bill does nothing to improve the supply or the quantity of housing.

There are two things that I should like to see in the Bill when it returns from another place. One most important matter is in relation to homelessness. There has recently been a court decision to the effect that the homeless persons legislation only requires a local authority to make provision for the homeless and not to provide housing. That interpretation of the law is nonsensical. I hope that the Government will undertake to amend that aspect of homelessness law in another place. There is also the question of interpretation of section 91 of the Housing Act 1985. There is some misunderstanding about whether that section makes a tenancy assignable or simply capable of assignment.

The other matter that the Bill does not deal with satisfactorily is the problem of the inner city. Of course, there is the urban regeneration grant. We discussed that matter constructively in Committee. However, although there has been a period of quiet and the inner cities have been hibernating over a long winter and a cool spring, the Bill's attempts to deal with the inner cities and urban regeneration are not nearly sufficient to tackle the problem.

I represent an inner city constituency. There are over 3,000 unemployed school and college leavers in my borough. That is not untypical of the situation in many city areas. In other words, three battalions of young appear to have lost the struggle before they have started the fight. The effects of such a level of unemployment flow back into the schools and demoralise the entire community.

Lambeth has a problem that has been repeated in Handsworth and other inner city areas — the virtual impossibility for some businessmen of insuring their premises. There can be no greater disincentive to setting up a business than finding that you cannot get insurance cover to protect it. That is a very serious symptom of the problems of the inner city.

Poverty continues to increase as well as unemployment, and the measures in the Bill in that area are mere pinpricks. We shall have to return time and time again to the question of finding a more effective way of dealing with problems that could easily be resurrected as the weather becomes warmer. I am most concerned about the inadequacy of the Bill, in housing and inner city terms, to provide the resources to meet the undoubted problems that still exist.

Mr. Chapman: My right hon. Friend the Minister made some extraordinarily generous remarks about amendment No. 66. I appreciate very much what he said. I should also like to comment very briefly on Government amendment No. 36, which was inspired, I believe, by an amendment that I put forward in Committee. I am grateful to the Minister for agreeing that simplified planning zones should not be created in national parks, conservation areas, areas of outstanding natural beauty, areas of special scientific interest or—to add a final rider—green belt areas. I have the privilege to be the president of the London Green Belt Council. The amendment is a great advance and will give immense reassurance to environment organisations concerned with the conservation of our countryside.

The Minister courteously informed me, after I moved an amendment in Committee about the demolition of listed buildings and the relevant procedures, that he would introduce an amendment, on the lines that I suggested, in another place. I hope that he will take into consideration the words of the chairman of English Heritage and the joint committee of various organisations concerned with conserving, in an intelligent way, our architectural heritage. I was not responsible for designing any part of that heritage, but I believe that if we can conserve it, untold future generations will benefit. We have had very constructive Committee and Report stages, with active and intelligent participation from hon. Members on both sides, which has, indeed, improved the Bill.

10.29 pm

Mr. Cartwright: I agree with the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that, in its housing application, this is a Bill about management. But unlike him, I do not complain about that. Given the state of housing management, it is important to approach some of the problems that flow from that.

The interesting factor has been the degree of agreement across the political divide as to the ways in which housing management can be improved. The encouragement of housing co-operatives is one obvious example of that. The Bill makes a useful contribution towards making that idea a reality and towards giving people more control over their homes and their environment. I welcome the degree of agreement achieved over the need to encourage assured tenancies and to try to find new forms of rented accommodation to meet the need that clearly exists.

The urban regeneration grant may not make a dramatic contribution to the problems of our inner cities, but it should not be despised. It is worth having, and I welcome it. However, I am somewhat more sceptical about simplified planning zones. I should welcome them if they made a contribution, but I shall wait to see whether the fears that I and other have expressed are founded or whether the simplified planning zones make a bigger contribution than we expect.

I certainly endorse what the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has said. We have had some very useful debates on the Bill, and both sides of the House have co-operated to make it a better Bill. I pay tribute to the Minister for his sensitive handling of the Bill and for the way in which he has responded to constructive proposals and has returned with ways of meeting our objectives. He has not always met them in full, but he has honestly and sincerely tried to take our views into consideration. That has greatly helped the Bill's passage.

Mr. Winnick: The Bill should not go to the other place wihout its critics once again making their position clear, just as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) has done.

The Bill does not help to provide a single new dwelling. Incidentally, I am glad that the Secretary of State is now present. There is a formidable housing crisis. Thousands of families have no accommodation of their own, and live with their relatives or friends, or, as we know, in bed and breakfast accommodation. There is a huge waiting list of people who need to be housed. Many families in my constituency are housed in multi-storey blocks. They do not want to buy their flats, but they would like the opportunity to transfer to houses. That point has been made time and again to me and, I would have thought, to many hon. Members by their own constituents.

Earlier, the Minister said that he wanted to nail the lie that tenant security was being undermined. But the security of many council tenants is certainly being undermined as a result of the Bill, because it is intended that a local authority should be able to sell to the private sector. It will be up to the court to decide and so on, but that will not offer much protection to those tenants. The Bill is obsessed with privatisation. For example, there is the clause that deals with the privatisation of council estates. I took a deputation to see the Under-Secretary of State and they were seen by civil servants. The Rosehill estate in Willenhall in my constituency is desperately in need of modernisation. At long last there is a chance of that estate being modernised. These are pre-war dwellings. Last summer, I went around with a senior representative of the Department of the Environment who saw for himself the conditions in which my constituent's live on the estate.

To foot the bill of modernisation, the council is being effectively blackmailed into agreeing to sell off at least 20 houses and some open land on that estate before the necessary finance is authorised so that Rosehill can be modernised. That is an illustration of the Government's obsession with privatisation, and their desire to privatise many dwellings in the public sector.

I see no reason why we should refrain from criticising, or why Labour candidates should not warn tenants up and down the country of the likely effect of the legislation in the near future. What is required is the opposite of what the Bill offers. Increased public investment in houses is required, and the opportunity once again for local authorities to be in a position to build.

It has been estimated that fewer than 30,000 council dwellings will be started this year. I wonder whether the Secretary of State is proud of that. Many council dwellings need to be modernised and local authorities should have the financial means of carrying out the work.

For all those reasons, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that we are justified in opposing the measure. It will go through because the Government have their majority, but we shall do what is necessary. We shall tell the country what is at stake. I have no doubt at all that many people will be even more determined to vote Labour as a result of this measure.

Mr. Marlow: I give the Bill my blessing. It is a tremendous Bill. It gives great hope and opportunity to many people who are not living in the best of circumstances. It gives them a better opportunity to buy their flats and to manage them.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the tremendous way in which he ran the Committee and the business this evening. I extend my thanks to the main protagonists on the Front Bench opposite the hon. Members for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). It was the most positive and stimulating Committee on which I have had the pleasure to serve.

[Mr. Marlow]

I am only sorry that the bad fairy had to turn up, with the spiteful remarks that he has recently made. I can assure him that this beautiful Bill will live and survive. If anyone is going to prick his finger it will be him.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Following the blessing of the Bill by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), if will be difficult to make excessive remarks.

It was not for want of interest that the Liberal party was not represented on the Committee. It was a small Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) spoke for the alliance. He attended on every occasion, or on all but one occasion. He was a regular attender, participant and contributor. We pay tribute to him for that.

Some things remain to be said. The Government came to office saying that they would make Britain the best-housed nation in the world. They have so fundamentally failed in their policy that the Bill will not do more than bring occasional improvement and hope to some people.

There are good signs. People are beginning to accept and recognise the need for co-operatives, and, as I said on Report, we hope for more. Improvements have been made in relation to service charges. An amendment was passed on Report in relation to improvement grants for blocks of flats where work has so far not been possible. Those are certainly improvements.

I hope, as the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said, that before the Bill completes its passage through both Houses it will be able to accommodate something to amend the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and which the judgment in the case of Puhlhofer v. Hillingdon Borough Council has shown to be defective.

The Act does not give homeless people any security of decent accommodation in the way that it was thought it did until the House of Lords judgment.

I end with a reflection which is very much a daily vision in a constituency such as mine. Unless the Government do something that moves away from the two policies of privatisation and deregulation of housing and planning we will sadly see the creation of two nations. We need a much more serious attack than the Bill is providing.

My constituency contains the London Docklands Development Corporation and the Southwark council area outside the LDDC. In one area we see people in depressing council accommodation, often in tower blocks, many of whom cannot be adequately housed. In the other area we see people enjoying the benefits of the deregulated docklands corporation, where properties are changing hands at exploitative prices for figures in excess of £175,000, grossly abusing the entitlement of many other people to a decent share of housing in London. It puts up the price of land and drives away people who have a right, because they are local to communities such as ours in the docklands, from the places that are their own.

The result convinces me that the magic of the marketplace, as the former Minister responsible for housing used to call it, does not provide the answer. Only if people have control, participation and shares in their communities and housing, and in the planning of their areas in a democratic way, where everybody, no matter what his status or income, has an equal chance, will we begin to house our nation and plan for it properly.

There are some good things, but the fundamental failure of the Government to address the malaise of the inner cities and beyond has not been remedied by the Bill. I regret that and hope that the Government realise their derogation and dereliction of duty. With every month that passes their administration causes problems for many areas of Britain from which they will find it difficult to recover.

Mr. John Patten: At this stage I wish only to thank those hon. Members on both sides of the House who have said kind words about the ministerial team on the Bill. I would also like to thank those hon. Members on both sides of the House who improved the Bill so much in Committee and on Report.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Higher Education (NAB Report)

Motion made, and question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

10.42 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I seek a clear statement from the Minister about the position in which polytechnics and colleges find themselves in regard to their funding for 1987-88, the future of many of their courses and, above all I seek a clear statement of the number of students that will be admitted in that year. The fact that there is widespread confusion on these vital matters is a direct result of the Government's incompetent management and neglect of higher education in our country.

On Monday the Minister described education as being in "creative ferment at all levels."

He admitted that that made it a "difficult period". What a euphemism. For "creative ferment" he should more properly have said chaos. To appreciate the extent of this crisis it is necessary to describe briefly the present state of higher education—the context in which the National Advisory Body's planning exercise for 1987-88 is taking place.

On Monday the Minister said:

"British higher education is among the best in the world". —[Official Report, 21 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 72.]

I would agree in many respects. We certainly have some of the best teachers, best courses and best institutions, but our age participation rate is appallingly low at 13 per cent. Japan provides higher education for 20 per cent. of its young people and the United States provides higher education for 22 per cent. In western Europe only Portugal and Ireland have a lower proportion of 18-year-olds entering higher education.

In his reply the Minister may say that the fact that the number of students entering polytechnics and colleges has risen by 70,000 since 1979 is the Government's one single achievement in higher education. However, the Government have made higher education pay a very bitter price for that gain. They have not provided the additional money to educate those students. Indeed, expenditure on higher education has been cut by 10 per cent. in real terms. Britain is the only country in western Europe which is cutting expenditure on higher education. Every other country recognises that to meet the needs of industry, technology and the future they must expand higher education. This country is, however, reducing expenditure on higher education.

The ratio of staff to students has worsened in this country by 25 per cent. and expenditure per student has decreased by 20 per cent. Purchasing for equipment, books, library provision, crucial periodicals, support staff such as technicians and all the resources necessary to provide the high quality higher education, have been cut and are now critically underfunded.

The National Advisory Body, set up to advise the Government, clearly stated that no more savings could be made. That is the context in which the Secretary of State wrote to the Minister as chairman of the National Advisory Body on 3 February and said:

"I would like to invite NAB for its planning exercise to adopt (as well as the assumption adopted hitherto by the secretariat and the chairman's study group), the assumption that the 1987-88 Quantum might show an increase of 3·5 per cent."

Translated, that meant a shortfall of £23 million. The NAB secretariat went away and attempted to work out what this planning assumption of the Secretary of State would mean in practice.

On 4 April the secretariat wrote to the directors of polytechnics and colleges with their conclusions. These involve a 6 per cent. cut in student numbers in engineering, technology, construction, science, health, mathematics, business management and in design. They would also mean an 11 per cent. cut in modern languages and a 16 per cent. cut in humanities. Specifically, they would mean that the Rose Bruford college would close, in spite of a recent excellent report from Her Majesty's inspectorate. All humanities would cease at Newcastle, Brighton and north Cheshire polytechnics. At the north Staffordshire polytechnic in my constituency, modern languages would go, computing would lose 70 students and social sciences 116. Sunderland polytechnic would lose its civil engineering department and perhaps most damaging and most idiotic of all, Wolverhampton polytechnic would lose all of its engineering, cutting some 600 students over the three years and losing 35 staff. It is idiotic that that should happen in a town that is founded and based on engineering, and it is equally idiotic to cut a department in which the computer-aided design and computer-aided manufacture centre had recently received £70,000 investment from the National Westminster bank. That must be a crazy policy.

Everyone in this country believes that we should encourage computer-aided design and manufacturing; only this Government could have created circumstances which have led to cuts in that provision. In all, the total number of students entering polytechnics and colleges in 1987-88 would be reduced by 9,400 full-time equivalents —that is over 12,000 students in real, human terms who would be affected. What a farce!

Faced by the unanimous condemnation of the education world and the anger of parents and potential students, the Secretary of State and the Minister have done their best since then to dismiss the NAB's planning exercise. The Minister called it a "campaign of alarmism" and the Secretary of State more tersely called it "rubbish", "a single guess". However, the professional staff at the NAB have based the exercise on the Secretary of State's assumption, which he invited NAB to adopt. As the Secretary of State set the assumption for the planning exercise, it does not become him to disown it now.

I understand that the Minister is telling his colleagues and anyone else who will listen that the NAB should have produced more than one assumption that, as the letter said: "it might be appropriate for NAB to adopt a range of assumptions".

Indeed, his next sentence in the letter of 3 February specifies the additional assumption that the Secretary of State had in mind—the one "adopted hitherto by the Secretariat". It did in fact adopt that assumption which allows for a cut of £42 million and 18,000 fewer students. Is that the assumption that the NAB should have sent to the directorate? Is that the range of options that the Minister is now saying it should have adopted? The Minister does not seem to be very keen to respond and it is no wonder because he was in the chair at the NAB committee meeting on 27 February when the central planning assumption was agreed. He will recall that one other person was there on that day—the Secretary of State. Both of them were in the room. They heard the discussion. They knew the framework laid down by the board. It really is hypercritical of them to seek to dismiss the reality of that now.

The truth is that the Secretary of State and the Minister have bungled this planning exercise, just as they have damaged so many other parts of our education system. They are both zealots for cuts in public expenditure and they have delivered over education for the knife without a struggle. Then they seem to be surprised, or perhaps confused, when such cuts are made. They say, "No, it is not us; it is the directors of the polytechnics, the NAB". Nobody in Britain believes what the Secretary of State and the Minster say. Their hands are not clean. They are responsible for this assumption and the conclusions that run inexorably from it.

The Minister may well say that there was a further alternative for the NAB. It could have chosen to cut the unit of resource, the expenditure per student, still more. But that was never proposed at that meeting of 27 February, as I understand. But, as Mr. Clive Booth, the director of Oxford polytechnic and a former senior official of the Department of Education and Science has said:

"In polytechnics, spending per student is the lowest ever."

As the Council for National Academic Awards has said in a recent unpublished paper,

"There is little if any scope for further reductions in the resourcing of public sector institutions in England if the quality of courses . . . is to be sustained at acceptable levels."

Indeed the CNAA goes on to conclude that if the present resourcing policies are continued, it will have to choose between accepting lower course quality and withdrawing course approval. That is a stark choice between numbers and quality. No wonder what Mr. Christopher Ball, the chairman of the NAB, has said that cuts are inevitable if we are to maintain the quality of provision.

Tonight in this Adjournment debate we need to know who is right. Is it the CNAA and the NAB and almost everybody else in higher education who say that a reduction of £23 million in 1987-88 — which follows from the Secretary of State's own assumption—will lead to either lower quality or to a reduction in students, or is it the Secretary of State and the Minister who say that this is rubbish?

The Secretary of State and the Minister have sought to avoid that question by saying that we should leave it until later in the year and that it will all work out in the negotiations, or, perhaps less honourably in his speech to the directors of polytechnics, the Secretary of State blames teachers in higher education for last year's pay award. That simply will not wash.

If the NAB and the CNAA are wrong, let the Minister answer five important questions tonight. First, what will be the number of students entering polytechnics in 1987-88? Secondly, what courses will be available to them? Thirdly, how many staff will teach those courses? Fourthly, what resources will they have to do that work? Fifthly, what unit of resource and range of teachers will be available?

The Minister may say that those are imponderables because they flow from the planning exercise, although it is a planning exercise which he himself set up. Nobody in higher education would advocate a return to the old system which was clearly indefensible, but surely the Minister can see that the present arrangements for the exercise are fatally flawed. Decisions made in the autumn will not be conveyed to polytechnics until December. That will leave them six, or at the most nine, calendar months to effect those changes. It simply is not possible to make reductions on those scales without knowing before December what courses will be offered. They cannot be advertised honestly or put into effect.

Surely the sensible thing would be to adopt the recommendations of the Jarratt committee on the universities and opt for a three-year cycle of planning for higher education. I believe that the Jarrett committee on the public sector will also adopt that view, but, sadly, it is a view rejected by the Secretary of State's Green Paper. I urge him, as a constructive criticism, to think again to avoid such problems. If the Minister insists that this form of planning exercise, on a yearly basis, is the right method and if he insists that he will not give any undertakings tonight the British people will consider that he is playing games with higher education.

He will fuel the confusion and demoralisation which is already rife in higher education. Parents, students and teachers in higher education are angered by the present confusion and uncertainty. They want, and the country wants, better provisions for higher education and more secure, long-term planning certainties.

We could plan with such a certainty and deliver the skills our higher education is capable of delivering but which, at present, we are sadly lacking. Tonight is an opportunity for the Minister to repair some of the damage that has been caused since 4 April. That damage flows inexorably from the Secretary of State's letter to the Minister and the assumptions which he suggested that NAB should make. If the Minister cannot reassure people, higher education is in a parlous state. I do not believe that is the Minister's intention. This is an opportunity for the Minister to put some certainty into higher education and give us the planning base which we undoubtedly need.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent Central (Mr. Fisher), for giving the House this opportunity to debate the planning exercise for 1987-88 now being undertaken by the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher education — NAB for short. Equally, I welcome the chance to discuss the planning of the public sector more generally.

The National Advisory Body secretariat's consultative student number proposals, which were circulated to institutions on 4 April, have, in particular, received extensive coverage in the press. Not all of that coverage has been careful to distinguish their status. That may not be entirely the fault of the media, since this is the second time this year that they have been invited by NAB to contemplate substantial reductions in intakes in 1987-88. The first time was in January when the putative reduction totalled 18,000 places. Now it is a more modest 10,000. This is all the more regrettable because of the inevitable anxieties to institutions, their staff and to students and parents that confusion about the Government's policies can cause. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman, for rather transparent purposes, has chosen to try to muddy the waters further.

There are even better examples of this confusion than the hon. Gentleman's speech. On 8 April the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister:

"was the dispatch of a letter from the National Advisory Body committee to the directors of polytechnics a mistake, or did it not take place, or is it another fantasy?" — [Official Report, 8 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 16.]

The answer is yes, it was a fantasy. I am the chairman of the committee in question and no such letter was sent. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to apologise on behalf of his right hon. Friend for misleading the House, I shall be happy to give way to him on this point.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister knows very well that the NAB secretariat sent a letter on 4 April to the directors of polytechnics and colleges. He has a copy of the letter.

I have copies of that letter, sent to several polytechnics. Surely he does not want to deny the fact that Christopher Bull, on behalf of NAB, sent out that letter?

Mr. Walden: I am saddened by that intervention, because it shows that the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to apologise on behalf of his right hon. Friend for misleading the House. and he also seems to be confused about the exact state of affairs. I hope that I can further enlighten him in the course of my speech.

The hon. Gentleman has been careful to avoid the most yawning pitfalls, but he has still not got it right—as we have just seen. I am glad to have this opportunity to set the consultative proposals by the NAB secretariat in context and, in so doing, to allay the anxieties to which I referred. To that end, I should first make clear that the proposals issued by the NAB secretariat are not Government decisions, nor reflections of Government policy.

The proposals are, in fact, the first results of a planning process and the work of the secretariat of the National Advisory Body. The NAB was established in 1982 in response to the need for some form of central planning of the maintained sector of higher education following the "capping" in 1980 of the advanced further education pool which shares the cost of local authority higher education between authorities. Its remit was, and is, to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State annually on the disposition of academic provision within the sector and on the consequential distribution of the advanced further education pool between authorities in respect of their institutions providing advanced work. In 1985 that remit was extended to include the voluntary colleges. As part of its remit NAB conducts a major revision of academic and institutional plans every third year. The first review was in respect of the years 1984-85 to 1986-87 and was completed in December 1983. The second, on which it is now engaged, will cover the years 1987-88 to 1990-91.

It is axiomatic that an exercise of this kind, looking ahead over a period of three years, cannot foresee all eventualities and must perforce adopt some assumptions as a basis for developing its plans. So it is with the NAB secretariat's consultative proposals that were circulated just over three weeks ago, which were prepared with a view to the formulation of draft advice to the Secretary of State for consideration by the NAB board and committee later this year.

The proposals are based on a single assumption about the resources likely to be available for public sector higher education in 1987-88. It was on that assumption that the NAB committee invited the secretariat to draw up proposals which would restore the level of funding per student to its planned 1985-86 level.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Walden: No. I believe genuinely that the hon. Gentleman has quite a lot to learn about this, so he must listen very carefully.

It is, among other things, because the committee believes that funding in 1987-88 will not fully compensate for previous inflation that a 7 per cent. reduction in intakes has, for the time being, been embodied in the secretariat's consultative proposals for 1987-88. In fact, the quantum for 1986-87 increased by 6 per cent., which included an allowance of 4·5 per cent. for year on year inflation, whereas I now note that the Government forecast for inflation in 1986-87 has fallen below 4 per cent. This all goes to show how hazardous these projections are and how misleading it can be to try to enshrine them in concrete.

I stress the contingency of all this, however, also because the actual resources available for 1987-88 will not be known until the autumn. Not until then will the NAB committee — I stress the committee — decide how to advise the Secretary of State about the number of students in aggregate who can be accommodated, not about the subject and institutional implications. At that juncture, as the NAB secretariat's letter covering the proposals itself notes, the committee will have to review the hypothesis used to date and, to quote the letter:

"may wish to consider other options."

The NAB normally tenders it final advice towards the end of the year, whereon the Secretary of State has normally announced his decisions by Christmas.

The hon. Gentleman has suggested that the existing assumptions about funding should be given particular credence because I, as chairman of the NAB committee, am a party to them. That is to misunderstand my position. I hope that that is not done deliberately. My colleagues on the committee, who comprise the chairman of the board and six councillors representing local education authorities, well understand that in addition to chairing their meetings I am also a Minister in my right hon. Friend's Department. I cannot, wearing my ministerial hat, compel the committee to reach any conclusion that it was not inclined otherwise to reach or, wearing my chairman's hat, commit my right hon. Friend to accepting whatever advice the committee may choose to put forward to him.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Walden: No. If I could do either of these things, what would be the purpose of having a national advisory body?

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Walden: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fisher: Does the Minister dispute that the board acted on the assumption upon which it was invited to act by the Secretary of State in the letter that I specified earlier? The board projected the Secretary of State's assumption into the hypothesis that it worked out.

Mr. Walden: By referring to the board the hon. Gentleman has given a new stir to the muddy water that he has already created. We are not discussing the functions of the board. We are discussing the functions of the committee and its secretariat. I suggest only that the hon. Gentleman should continue to listen most carefully to what I have to say. Then he may learn how these things actually work.

It remains the case that the Government's position has been the same throughout. Both at the level of the NAB board, on which officials from my Department sit, and in the Committee we have pressed NAB to plan on the basis of a variety of funding assumptions.

The hon. Gentleman also sought to convict the Government of a disregard for the maintenance of quality. The hon. Gentleman deduces a threat to quality from the evidence of declining unit costs in the public sector since 1979. He asserts that the limit of what is an acceptable level of funding per student has now been reached and that the Government cross it at risk to the maintenance of quality.

Obviously the Government are watching very closely the relationship between funding and quality. We are by no means suggesting that the system is infinitely elastic, but there are important issues here about the relationship between resources and student numbers which go to the heart of what planning is about. The hon. Gentleman's charicteristically lavish prescription implied in his speech simply to spend more money does not even begin to address these problems. Perhaps, therefore, in the time remaining, I could take his education in hand.

The background to the fall in unit costs—11 per cent. across the system as a whole—often cited as an index of quality, is the sustained expansion of student numbers, and hence of access, which has occurred in the first half of this decade. Since 1979, the public sector as a whole has absorbed an increase in students of 27 per cent. In polytechnics alone the growth has been about 37 per cent. That is a formidable and impressive achievement. The orderly assimiliation of these additional numbers owes much to the quality of NAB's planning since 1982—and no one is suggesting that NAB always gets it wrong.

There is, however, no general evidence that it has been achieved at the expense of quality. That is because the resources necessary to sustain the expansion were largely already in place. Accommodation and resources which had been laid down in the 1970s in anticipation of student demand which either failed to materialise, or materialised at a slower rate than expected, were filled up only in the 1980s. The fall in unit cost is thus in practice a measure of the more efficient and intensive exploitation of spare capacity.

The proof of this is to be found in the performance of the student/staff ratio, which, across the system as a whole, has taughtened from 8·2:1 in 1979 to 10·8:1 in 1984, but still remains below the target of 12:1 established by NAB itself—I emphasise that—as a basis for its planning. Thus the National Advisory Body, in its strategy advice to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about higher education in the late 1980s and beyond, published in September 1984, judged, in the light of the views of Her Majesty's Inspectorate and the validating bodies, that the fall in unit costs was not in itself a ground on which it could argue for an increase in the funding per student. I do not accept, therefore, the hon. Gentleman's thesis that we are witnesses to a protracted attenuation of resources. One man's fall in funding per head is another man's efficiency saving.

Nor do my right hon. Friend or I accept—and this appears to be NAB's current thesis—that there is no further realistic scope for a more cost effective distribution of provision across the system. Within the public sector of higher education, the polytechnics as a group are now operating what is evidently a tight ship. The average polytechnic student-staff ratio in 1984-85 stood at 11·5:1, close to, though still below, the 12:1 target. I recognise that there is concern within some polytechnics about the stringency of resources and that this concern has played its part in the NAB committee's decision to accord priority to sustaining a particular level of funding per student—the unit of resource. However, I remain sceptical of the invariable relationship which the unit of resource presupposes between funding and student numbers: namely, that each student comes at an average cost and that, for every rise or fall in the real level of funding, access should be increased or diminished commensurately.

A recent paper by the Council for National Academic Awards, to which the hon. Gentleman has referred and which was submitted to the National Advisory Body, encapsulates my own doubts in stipulating that the relationship is not a mechanical one. Common sense surely confirms that judgment. How can the unit of resource hold good as a description of the relationship between resources and numbers when a significant proportion of the system's costs are attributable to its buildings and other facilities which are relatively inelastic to demand? Thus I note that the CNAA paper, which is far more complicated than suggested, though estimating that the present resource level may create difficulties for the maintenance of quality in the longer term, also implies that current funding is above the resource level necessary in the short term. In other words, across the system as a whole the existing infrastructure is equal to the demands now placed on it.

I particularly regret the pretext which dependence on the unit of resource supplies to those unwilling or unable to scrutinise how the system might be better organised to make resources go further and to sustain quality. The efficient allocation of places and resources is not only the key to orderly planning but is NAB's job and fundamental to the partnership between Government and local authorities which NAB embodies and which has worked well a number of times.

It is undeniable that there is overcapacity to be discerned in the system. By contrast with the efficient polytechnics, the student-staff ratio elsewhere in the local authority higher education sector stood at 9·6:1 in 1984-85. That is indicative of substantial spare teaching capacity. I think that not only the taxpayer and ratepayer but those institutions currently experiencing financial stringency have a right to ask why that spare capacity might not be rationalised and resources freed to flow to those parts of the system which are under presssure. If I were the director of a polytechnic which had played its part in the expansion of access in this decade, I should ask that question insistently.

It is my firm belief that we do ourselves no service by turning our back on these complications, and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman chose to do that. I do not doubt the sincerity of the directors of individual polytechnics who have expressed to me concern about resources. I have talked to a number of them. I was interested that the hon. Gentleman mentioned Wolverhampton, because I visited the polytechnic there when the local collaborative project which involved the Westminster bank was being launched. I had a chance on the spot to calm the excessive fears that had been aroused.

I do not dissent from the proposition that our investment in public sector higher education should be such as to build on existing strengths and to maintain quality. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to apply his mind to realistic judgments on educational economics. The arguments about the maintenance of quality and building on existing strengths will not carry conviction unless and until it can be shown that existing resources are being used cost effectively. I hope that what I have said makes it clear that there is some way to go—I would not exaggerate how far—before we can truthfully say that. In the meantime —I stress this——

The Question having been proposed after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at twelve minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 25 April 1986

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Social Security Reform

9.35 am

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of over 5,000 residents of Glasgow, mostly of the Hillhead division. The petition states:

legislation based on the 'Reform of Social Security — Programme for Action' White Paper would be extremely detrimental to the residents of the United Kingdom who are in receipt of Social Security benefits. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House do not pass legislation arising out of the Reform of Social Security White Paper. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

9.36 am

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I beg leave formally to present a petition on behalf of some 60,000 of my constituents. Because I want it to be formally incorporated into the proceedings of the House, I shall ask the Clerk to read the body of the petition.

THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE read the petition, which was as follows:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of the residents of the villages of Fulbeck, Leadenham, Caythorpe, Brant Broughton, Brandon, Stubton, Fenton, Beckingham, Stragglethorpe, and other places in the counties of Lincoln and Nottingham.

Sheweth that your petitioners are wholly opposed to the proposal announced by Nirex to consider Fulbeck airfield as a possible site for the disposal of nuclear waste material; that your petitioners are also opposed to Nirex carrying out exploratory works at Fulbeck airfield; that your petitioners do not believe that burial in shallow trenches is a proper or safe way of disposing of intermediate nuclear waste material. Also that your petitioners do not accept that the geology or hydrology to be found at Fulbeck airfield are such as to make safe burial of short life intermediate nuclear waste material possible. Further, your petitioners assert that the roads in the area are inadequate for the safe transport of radioactive material. Your petitioners are also concerned by the proximity of dwelling houses to the proposed site and the impact upon their value of the proposal announced by Nirex.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House shall not approve any order which would cause or allow Nirex to carry out any works whatsoever at Fulbeck airfield.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Obscene Publications (Protection of Children, etc.) (Amendment) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to object, to and to ask you to reconsider, your selection for today. You have not selected my new clause that seeks to amend the Bill, and I do not think that the reasons that I have heard are reasonable ones.

My attempt to amend the Bill arose from the provisions of the Bill as put before the House on Second Reading, which included, for example, a list of visual images that were to be accounted obscene. I was not on the Committee, so my next chance to amend the Bill arises on Report, but a new clause related to the Bill as originally drafted is not to be accepted for discussion. There is enormous public feeling about this matter. When there is strong feeling outside that there should be some change in the law, but the matter cannot be discussed in the House, the House is brought into disrepute.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Lady.

I have explained to her why I could not accept her new clause. As she knows, her amendment is starred and was tabled only yesterday. The Bill was reported more than 10 days ago and it is not normally my practice to select starred amendments. It is quite in order for the hon. Lady to advance her arguments during the debate on the amendments on the Order Paper that have been selected.

Clause 1

ACT TO APPLY TO TELEVISION AND SOUND BROADCASTING

9.41 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 6 at end insert:

'Provided that nothing in Section 1 shall be construed as affecting the responsibilities of the Governors of the BBC, or the duties of the members of the Independent Broadcasting Authority under the Broadcasting Act 1981 or of the cable authority under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984'.

I would never dream of questioning in any way either the decisions of the House or the decisions that are taken by you, Mr. Speaker, on its behalf. You are a remarkable Speaker, by whom the House is extremely well served. The point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) illustrates some of the difficulties that we faced during the passage of the Bill.

When the Bill first came before the House I believed that there would be a fairly balanced examination, not just of the implications of changing the law to put extra restrictions on the broadcasting of material or on the display of indecent magazines, but at least, in a fairly responsible way, of the problems that any legislature faces when it is legislating for a society that changes its measure of moral interpretation over the years and which alters its attitude. In legislating, we must remain both reasonable and acceptable to the great bulk of the people.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

The Bill has not been conceived or examined in that light or in that manner. From the beginning we have seen a demonstration of a number of strongly held prejudices. We have heard from many hon. Members that the need to take action on certain services such as broadcasting arose because of great abuses and out of the difficulties that are faced day by day by ordinary families seeking to protect themselves, and especially their children, from obscene material. If that is so, there is a great responsibility on the House to produce evidence and not just to say, "I am offended by some of the things I see and I would not want my children to see them."

We need to produce hard, detailed evidence and such evidence has been sadly lacking, especially in relation to the broadcasting authorities, from the time that we started to look at this legislation. We have had demonstrations of items to which hon. Members have objected, but there is always a danger in Members waxing eloquently and indignantly about broadcasting. To start with, very few hon. Members see much television. If we asked hon. Members how many hours of broadcasting or even narrowcasting they saw in a month, they would find great difficulty in demonstrating that they had seen anything like one hundredth of the material that is normally seen by our constituents.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): The hon. Lady speaks about the difficulty hon. Members have in seeing much television. Because of the hours that we work, that is right, but is there not the other difficulty exhibited in the Bill that all we have seen are the two main offenders in the eyes of the supporters of this Bill—the worst extracts of two films that went out at midnight on Channel 4?

9.45 am

Mrs. Dunwoody: The hon. Gentleman makes a strong point, and it underlines what worries me. On Second Reading we heard constantly about two programmes and some hon. Members have since watched extracts from them. I certainly did not see the whole of one film because I was bored by it and turned it off. Before we change legislation that covers our broadcasting authorities, we have to be sure not only that we have a reason to do so, but that we can demonstrate that those broadcasting authorities are not fulfilling their duties and are not carrying out the tasks set for them after considerable care and examination by the House. We have arrived at this point in Third Reading without that ever having been demonstrated.

We had a most interesting and unique Committee stage and we went forwards and backwards putting little changes into the Bill. As a result, the Bill that we are now debating bears little resemblance to the one that we debated on Second Reading. It is the function of the House to change legislation for the better, but to change the inadequate for the inadequate is extraordinary. The amendment seeks to make it clear that we will look at the existing legislation and accept that both the BBC and the IBA have their duties clearly laid out in existing legislation. So far, we have not demonstrated that those authorities are not doing the job that they are meant to do. That is the most important point.

This may be the moment for me to say something about matters that have worried me for some time. There is a concerted attempt on the part of a quite small pressure lobby to change a great deal of the legislation on the basis of that lobby's prejudices. That is quite legitimate and I have no objection to it, as long as the House is perfectly well aware of the fact that it is being pressured. I often ask myself if we are not changing the whole climate in which we examine broadcast material. I am not at all sure who the members of the National Viewers' and Listeners' Association are, but I am sure that they are all upstanding and noble people. Whoever they are, they have been behind a concerted attempt through this legislation to change the attitude of the House towards the broadcasting authorities. [Interruption.] I am happy to have that confirmed by hon. Gentlemen on the Government side, but they cannot demonstrate that the broadcasting authorities are not doing what they are supposed to do.

Where is the evidence of inadequate broadcasting control? We have gone through the whole Committee stage and I have seen no such evidence. Where are the names? In Committee I asked for hard evidence of these great obscenities eternally pumped out by both broadcasting authorities, and I was handed a most bizarre and amusing list containing adjectives that are common on most shop floors in Britain. The temptation to read it into the record was quite strong, but I resisted that temptation because it is about time that the House grew up in its attitude to important control. We are not here to write on to the statute book our own moral hang-ups; we are here to frame legislation that is sensible and balanced.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the hon. Lady accept that in an article written by Michael Winner he says:

"Few doubted that Channel 4's screening of 'Sebastiane' was an error."

He says exactly the opposite of the hon. Lady.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have the honour to know Mr. Michael Winner extremely well.

Mr. Brinton: Not too well.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I know him very well. One of my few criticisms of him is that he is a Conservative, but he will grow out of that eventually. I am pleased that he has been quoted, because "Sebastiane" was the only film, apart from "Jubilee", that was quoted throughout the passage of the Bill. It was shown very late at night and it illustrates the point I am making. We are proposing to change the entire responsibilities of the broadcasting authorities because two films upset some Members of Parliament.

I am talking about something that is very important. Broadcasting authorities that fulfil their duties must be prepared to produce guidelines that they stick to and that grade material throughout a 24-hour period. After all, we are often talking about more than 18 hours of broadcasting per day. The authorities must try to programme so that the majority of people can enjoy the material. But today we seem to be saying that, no matter what time of the day or night the material is broadcast, it must be acceptable to children, because some children are up at midnight or even after that. On that basis, it does not matter what sort of material adults wish to see, as long as there is any possibility that one inadequate parent allows his child to stay up later than is normal for children. Apparently, if that happens we must change the law to protect that child. That is an exceedingly odd argument.

The other argument used by Conservative Members is that one need not even be present if a video recorder is used, and so long as the material broadcast is capable of being recorded and played back, it must conform with a viewing association's view of what constitutes adult material. That is extraordinary and very disquieting. It represents direct censorship of any material other than that which is suitable for showing to a small child.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow) rose——

Mrs. Dunwoody: I give way to our own Jack in the box.

Mr. Hayes: I find myself in the embarrassing position of entirely agreeing with what the hon. Lady says——

Mrs. Dunwoody: Sit down; I can't bear it.

Mr. Hayes: I am sure that I will eventually grow out of it. But the position is even worse than the hon. Lady has described. Although the Bill was introduced with the best of intentions, it has tried to solve the problem by invoking one of the worst pieces of legislation to be on the statute book. That legislation is wholly discredited and unworkable and is universally accepted as such. I refer to the Obscene Publications Act.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I might have got a round to that point, if the hon. Gentleman had given me the opportunity to do so. But it is important to consider how the IBA and the BBC operate. I do not have the greatest admiration for the judgment of journalists. Indeed, I believe it to be sadly lacking on most important issues. However, before we change the law, we should be clear about what happens now. I shall tell hon. Members what the IBA says, because unlike the BBC, it has gone to great trouble to ensure that we have a clear statement of its viewing policy. The IBA's statement is quite helpful, because it says things that amount to self-censorship being operated before the material is broadcast.

It is the IBA's aim not to broadcast material that is unsuitable for children at times when large numbers of children are viewing. The full text of the IBA's viewing policy, which forms part of the guidelines, makes it clear that the IBA believes that family viewing policy means that programmes are scheduled carefully throughout the evening to take account of the changing proportion of children and adult viewers and the responsibilities that parents should exercise as the evening progresses. The IBA also points out that that policy would be seriously prejudiced by the Bill.

If the Bill was enacted, all programmes would have to be suitable for children, as it makes no distinction between viewing at different times of the day or night. The IBA points out that it is required to make value judgments at every level. If programmes go out for 18 hours a day, some programmes will obviously anger individual hon. Members. The sort of objections that I might make would probably be quite different from the objections of others hon. Members, who seem more concerned about sex.

In am most concerned about violence and the constant conditioning that goes on. Some Conservative Members seems to find that perfectly acceptable, because the violence is shown in a sanitised American way that gives the impression that people can be thrown around the screen, that cars can be driven 18 times through any crash and that automatic weapons can be used with the victims being able to get up and walk away. As a good trade unionist I might see some reason for producing constant work for stuntmen, but that would be the only justification for many of those television programmes.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does not my hon. Friend's point go even further than that? Sometimes the portrayal of violence in an extremely shocking and revolting way, such as occurred—here I do not disagree with Conservative Members—in parts of "Jubilee" can sometimes have a far less damaging effect on those watching just because it produces revulsion, than the sanitised violence to which she has referred.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Hon. Members talk about violence, but not about the programmes that go out week after week that somehow give the impression that it is all right to knock someone six foot in the air and for him to break a bone.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I agree wholeheartedly with the sentiments that the hon. Lady has just expressed. But what steps does she believe should be taken, as clearly present arrangements are not working very well?

Mrs. Dunwoody: The broadcasting authorities have guidelines. The IBA clearly sets out what is regarded as an offence to good taste and decency, and what is regarded as a portrayal of violence. But how often have Conservative Members objected to programmes such as "The A-Team" which come out every week? How often do they bother to sit down to write to the directors of the various companies saying that the implications of a programme are extraordinarily violent and amoral, because they suggest to young people that certain things are acceptable as long as the stuntman eventually gets up without any blood being split or obvious damage?

Such programmes are deadening. They alienate people over a long period of time, then they become the norm, and people think that that is really what happens. If we change the legislation in this way, that will not be affected —[Interruption.] If Conservative Members agree with me, they should tell me why they are seeking to change the law in such an inadequate way.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Will the hon. Lady answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith)? She says that programmes such as "The A-Team" become acceptable. That is our argument in favour of the Bill. What does she think should be done?

Mrs. Dunwoody: With the greatest respect, that is not the hon. Gentleman's argument for the Bill. There was never any suggestion that the Bill was aimed at such programmes. When we asked what he intended to do about the constant drip drip of violence, we were told that that was acceptable, because it was, in effect, sanitised. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for, Ladywood has had to table amendments to the Bill because she feels that it has created a moral ambience that exploits women or that produces an atmosphere in which females are somehow only part of the sex fantasies of middle-aged men.

Mr. Chris Smith: In response to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), will not my hon. Friend say that the extension of the Obscene Publications Act 1959 to cover radio broadcasting and television will not do anything to meet the problem caused by the constant drip, drip of violence witnessed in "The A-Team" and other programmes? There is no way in which one could say that such programmes tend to deprave and corrupt those watching them, within the terms of the law as it is understood.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend has described the real position. Some of us remember the absurdity of the trials under the Obscene Publications Act 1959, the numbers of people who were called as experts, the extreme cost and length of the trials which took place—only to prove, in the final analysis, that human beings are much more difficult to corrupt by sex than we had ever thought.

It is clear from the IBA code exactly what matters the authority considers to be important. There is a whole section, for example, on presentation and the young and vulnerable which I believe is very sensible. It is important that we should allow the IBA to exercise its role in a responsible and adequate manner.

10 am

The BBC has similar controls imposed upon it. If there is consistent evidence of failure on the part of those authorities, individual Members should be bringing those matters to the authorities' attention all the time.

Ms. Clare Short rose—

Mrs. Dunwoody: Hon. Members should not come to the House claiming that individual films are offensive and that therefore we must change the way the authorities operate.

Ms. Short: I agree with my hon. Friend that there is no problem about obscene sexual material appearing on television. I did not see the two films which so upset Conservative Members. However, I believe that the drip, drip of sanitised violence makes that violence normal and shapes children's thinking and attitudes to violence. Can we not deal with that problem by considering the guidelines, and should we not consider amending them to require the BBC and the IBA to minimise the number of programmes showing repetitive and sanitised violence? Should we not be seeking that reform?

Mrs. Dunwoody: There are a number of ways in which we could bring pressure to bear on the broadcasting authorities. It is perfectly possible to do that and I believe that there is already a great deal of self-censorship not only on sex and violence but also, I am sorry to say, about politics. There have been occasions during the past three years when the evidence has shown that the broadcasting authorities, faced with a programme which they believe might be politically sensitive, imposed self-censorship. Often it was only the reaction of the workers within the organisations which caused the material to be shown.

We do not need to change the law; we simply need to change the way in which we proceed. That is the point which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) was making very clearly.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Would the hon. Lady appreciate that the drip, drip aspect of violence is not disputed but that many people are absolutely fed up with pious thoughts and no action? The measures suggested in the Bill are a way for those who are in despair over inaction in the face of pious thoughts, to have recourse to action themselves.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The difficulty about that argument is that we should not deal with futility by doing something that is even more futile. That would happen under the Bill as it stands. Frankly, that has been my objection to this nonsense from the beginning.

I care about children and pornography. The suggestion that somehow or other we should produce a Bill with a grandiose sounding title and put it on to the statute book, is not sufficient. Some people would run a coach and horses through the legislation, and it may be so badly drafted that any lawyer worth his salt could get away with anything he wants. It must be wrong, in the face of that, for an hon. Member to return to his constituency party, self-satisfied and happy on a Friday and say, "I have personally helped with the passage of a new Bill onto the statute book." The fact that that Bill is even more stupid than the previous Bill, does not say much for the intelligence of the House of Commons.

Mrs. Bottomley: Is that not preferable to returning to one's constituency party and saying, "I have personally prevented the Bill from reaching the statute book?"

Mrs. Dunwoody: It is a matter of attitude. I think that my constituents send me to the House to frame good, workable and intelligent legislation. If they only send me here in order to make speeches which satisfy my ego, I do not know why I am here. I could go and wait in my bathroom or lavatory and do something more constructive.

We must make that distinction. We must realise that those who support gesture politics stand a real risk of the rest of the House saying that that is what it is—simply a gesture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I apologise for interrupting the hon. Lady, but, we must get back to the amendment. We should be dealing with the responsibilities of the governors.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is a terrible temptation to answer points raised by one's opposite numbers which causes me to stray from the issue under consideration.

The Obscene Publications Act 1959 will in no way improve or cover the responsibilities of the IBA or the BBC. There are existing powers which ensure that the material that is broadcast can be monitored. I do not believe in control and I believe that the Houses of Parliament get into difficulty when they try to monitor every programme that is broadcast. Many of us remember the 1930s and 1940s and what happens when the State seeks to control the minds and thoughts of people who are responsible for broadcasting material.

The authorities must be given clear guidelines—and they already have those. They must be told that the guidelines state their responsibilities, and they must be allowed to behave in a way which demonstrates that they understand their responsibilities. Simply quoting two films from the many hundreds of hours of broadcasting does not demonstrate that either of the broadcasting authorities are failing in their duties. That is what horrifies me about the Bill. We have had a discussion redolent of that kind of prejudice without any real evidence or facts.

The least that we can do is accept the amendment. If we do not accept the amendment, if it is not properly drafted in some way, we should make it clear that the IBA and the BBC at present have adequate machinery to organise their affairs so that they are not offensive to the bulk of the people and to ensure that they can operate without always fearing prosecution by any particular bigot. Perhaps it was unkind of me to say "bigot", although the world is full of eccentrics who see obscenity where ordinary people do not. People with real psychiatric problems should not have the opportunity to prosecute the IBA and the BBC on the basis of something that they thought they saw late at night on a programme.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am following the hon. Lady's comments with interest and I believe that she is making an important point. The obligations under the Broadcasting Act 1981 upon the IBA and the governors of the BBC are much tighter than the requirements of the Obscene Publications Act 1959. As the hon. Lady said, it is therefore very important to reassert that those Acts continue to apply. I would like to reassure her that nothing in the Bill, if it is enacted without the hon. Lady's amendment, will in any sense affect the obligations of the IBA and the governors of the BBC to apply a much stricter code than anything that is contained in the 1959 Act.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am happy to have that reassurance. However, can the Minister also assure me that individual pressure groups will not be able to take action against the broadcasting authorities without proper evidence, by using the Obscene Publications Act? If that happens we will open the door to an extraordinary series of long litigations which will not improve or clarify the existing position but will muddy the waters to such an extent that people will not know what is acceptable and what is not.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster) rose——

Mr. Mellor: I am sure that my hon. Friend was probably about to make the same point as me, as he is a lawyer. The hon. Lady has again raised an important point about bringing prosecutions; that matter will have to have the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mrs. Dunwoody: We can be comforted by the fact that the Director of Public Prosecutions, judging by the speed with which he acted in certain cases in the National Health Service, hardly rushes to respond to pressures. However, I hope that that will be sufficient for us.

I believe that the amendment would help, and I hope that the House will be prepared to accept it.

I have sat through the passage of the Bill and I am still not clear what was in the mind of the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) when he brought it forward. The flexibility which he has shown in removing and reinstating clauses has made it clear that we are debating a different Bill now from the one which was before the House on Second Reading. The Bill as it stands has a different import from the original measure. At the end of the day it would be absurd if all that came out of our many hours of examination of the matters pertaining to the Bill was a change in the way that the broadcasting authorities operate which would put them more at risk and would not overcome the real problems that have been debated by some of the more sensible Conservative Members.

If the House passes the Bill in its existing form, we will be into gesture politics with a vengeance. There has been no clear examination of the real difficulties surrounding the portrayal of violence on television. No real effort has been made to ascertain how the Bill will improve and protect children. In debating this mish-mash of nonsense we are giving it weight, responsibility and seriousness that it does not deserve. I hope that the amendment will be accepted, because it will make it clear that we are not inadvertently making major changes without endeavouring to make them responsible and sensible.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): First, I express my gratitude to the members of Standing Committee C for their helpful and constructive approach to the Bill. I have no doubt that the Bill has emerged from Committee significantly improved and I wish to acknowledge that fact. The Bill will fulfil the twin objectives with which I set out, which were to remove the specific exemption that applies uniquely to broadcasting, including television, from the provisions of the 1981 Act, and to make the more explicit sex magazines less accessible to children and young persons.

This is a modest Bill and I make no extravagant claims for what it would achieve. If enacted, I believe that it would help to protect children at an emotionally vulnerable age. I thank the members of the public who have written in their hundreds, with 9:1 in support of the Bill.

Mrs. Dunwoody: How many?

Mr. Churchill: I have received nearly 1,000 letters of support.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has received that number of letters. Perhaps he will tell us how many he received on the Shops Bill? Many of us received nearly 1,000 letters both for and against that Bill.

Mr. Churchill: I received about 50 letters on the Shops Bill.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Churchill: If the hon. Lady would forgive me——

Mrs. Dunwoody: No, I would not.

Ms. Clare Short The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) may be interested when I tell him that I have received 3,452 letters of support for my proposal in new clause 1 and amendment No. 25, and only 30 in opposition to it.

Mr. Churchill: I shall turn to that issue at a later stage when we deal with other amendments.

There is a broad measure of support throughout the country for the Bill and for something to be done to pull up the broadcasters and remind them rather more firmly than has been the case in recent years of their responsibilities to Parliament and to the public. There will undoubtedly be deep disappointment and concern — indeed anger—if their wishes are frustrated along with the will of Parliament, which was expressed so clearly on 24 January when the House voted by 5:1 in favour of giving the Bill a Second Reading.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The House had a different Bill before it on that occasion.

10.15 am

Mr. Churchill: There would be that reaction if their wishes were frustrated by only a handful of Members. I hope that that will not happen and that the spirit of friendly and constructive co-operation which prevailed in Committee will be continued.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): Will my hon. Friend tell those people who will be angry if the Bill does not complete its passage through the House exactly what the Bill will do to help them if it is enacted?

Mr. Churchill rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) responded to that invitation, we would be getting away from the amendment. We must discuss the amendment that is before the House.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. Member for Nantwich and Crewe (Mrs. Dunwoody) claims that the case for the Bill has thus far not been proved. The hon. Lady contends that the case has not been made that broadcasters have failed in self-regulation and suggests that thus far concern has been expressed only about two films—"Jubilee" and "Sebastiane". I hope to make it clear that that is not so and that concern is not restricted to those two films.

In addressing myself specifically to the amendment, I express strong agreement with the proposition advanced by the hon. Member for Nantwich and Crewe that nothing in clause 1 shall be construed as affecting the responsibility of the governors of the BBC or the members of the IBA. There is nothing in clause 1 that would do that. It should go without saying that the Broadcasting Act 1981 stands in its full vigour and that the Bill is merely a back-up measure of last resort that is aimed at ensuring respect for the guidelines and reinforcing the authority of the statutory bodies in upholding them. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has said, the standards of the guidelines enjoin each authority that "nothing is included in the programmes which offends against good taste or decency".

Those standards are far higher than the minimum ones that the Bill aims to guarantee. The fact that the authorities have failed in their duty to uphold such standards should be obvious to all except the most myopic of television viewers.

The hon. Member for Nantwich and Crewe referred to the films "Jubilee" and "Sebastiane", and I shall quote briefly from the reply of the Director-General of the IBA, Mr. John Whitney, of 27 March when he said, apropos these two films,

"we had very specifically in mind the statutory requirements of the Broadcasting Act . . . that nothing should be included in programmes which 'offends against good taste or decency or is likely to encourage or incite to crime or to lead to disorder or to be offensive to public feeling'. It was our considered opinion that neither film would conflict with the Act, provided they were shown late at night and as part of a season of films chosen and introduced by David Robinson, the film critic of 'The Times' . . . Both were widely shown in public cinemas, and, as you are aware, were at no stage prosecuted under the Obscene Publications Act."

That is extremely relevant because one of the elements in the test of obscenity is to have regard to the audience. I can well understand that neither of the two films in question would be prosecutable if shown to an audience of 18-year-olds plus. However, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a reply of great significance from Mr. Alasdair Milne, the Director-General of the BBC, of 8 April. He told me that for the month of February, the most recent month for which figures are available,

"the typical number of 4-17 year olds watching television between 11 p.m. and midnight ranges between 0·8 million and 1·8 million depending on the day of the week."

He added that after midnight to closedown the viewership of those aged between 4 and 17 years is between 8 per cent. and 13 per cent. What would be the fate of a cinema owner who regularly allowed 8 per cent. to 13 per cent. of his audience to be children from the age of 4 to 17 years? He would be prosecuted and his licence would be removed. I do believe——

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Churchill: The hon. Lady has had her opportunity, but I will give way.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Those who seek to prosecute the cinema owner would have to demonstrate that those children were in the cinema. I would love to know where the BBC got the figures from.

Mr. Churchill: The figures come from the Broadcasters' Audience Research Board. Both the IBA and the BBC draw their figures from that organisation.

There are between 800,000 to 1·8 million children watching the many X-rated films which go out. Mr. Alasdair Milne made it clear that, in the course of last year, there were no fewer than 62 X-rated films broadcast on the BBC alone. That is a significant figure.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that at no point in the 24 hours will it be possible for anyone to show any material which is not acceptable to children?

Mr. Churchill: What I am questioning and what millions of parents of small children and teenage children question is whether a broadcasting authority has the right

——

Mrs. Dunwoody: Parents have a right. There is a switch on the television—on-off.

Mr. Churchill: —in defiance of its statutory obligations to broadcast material which would be held to deprave and corrupt young people, when those films are available to adult-only cinemas.

Mr. Hayes: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I was horrified to learn that so many 14-year-olds are watching television at that time of night. Surely my hon. Friend must accept that it is most hypocritical for parents who have allowed their children to watch these sort of films to write and ask for legislation. The most worrying aspect is the lack of parental control.

Mr. Churchill: It may be fine to talk of parental control in the cosy Hampstead garden suburb in which the broadcasting apparatchik may reside with their nannies or au pairs to look after their children. However, in the type of area which I and many other hon. Members represent — industrial Britain — there are tens of thousands of families per constituency, single-parent families, families where the parents are shift workers, where no one is left at home to regulate the children's viewing. The figures produced by the BBC reveal that there are up to 1·8 million children who watch television up to midnight.

The idea that anything goes after 9 pm is a fraud and can no longer be used as justification by the broadcasting authorities. This week has been the horrifying case of a four-year-old girl who was raped by two 11-year-old boys.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Do not start on that.

Mr. Churchill: Where do 11-year-olds get the idea of committing such a crime if it is not from either pornographic magazines or from a diet of sex and violence thrust on them in their homes by television?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Demonstrate the evidence.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. Lady asks for evidence. I mention a letter I received from someone in Leicestershire who writes:

"At about 10.45 am on 20 February I tuned in to Central TV, to watch the School's programme."—

I stress school's programme—

"The programme was one of a series called 'Starting Out'. Two youngsters take Y.T.S. jobs at an hotel, the lad in the kitchens and the girl as a chambermaid . . . The girl gets plied with drink by the manager and before long we are shown her in bed in the hotel and the manager has come naked and completely uninvited into her bed and we are shown him raping her. The scene is quite explicit."

That is a school programme which goes out at 10.45 am on Saturday morning.

Another parent from Bridgend, Mid Glamorgan, wrote to the editor of the TV Times and said:

"During the children's school holiday, I turned on the TV at 10.45 am to see if there was anything suitable for my small children and heard: 'I expect he just wants to get into your knickers.'"

Another letter on the same televison programme states:

"We are not embarrassed: we are horrified that any school children are so exploited and subjected to such verbal muck."

That is what the broadcasters are allowed to put out on schools programmes. The broadcasters smugly ask for the link to be proved between violence and sex on television and what is happening in the country.

Broadcasters proclaim that this medium is the most powerful medium in the world for communication and for putting over ideas. If a television company is a commercial one it will try to sell a few minutes viewing time for thousands of pounds due to the viewing power of the medium.

A letter published in the Lancet on 22 March offers a link between a programme and the results of that programme. The letter was written by two doctors of the department of medicine at Hackney hospital and it states:

"On Sunday, March 2, the Omnibus edition of the BBC Television's soap opera Eastenders showed the character Angie taking an overdose. In the following week we experienced a 300 per cent. increase in the number of patients attending the accident-and-emergency department at the Hackney Hospital in East London for deliberate overdose . . . In the week after the Eastenders programme 22 patients attended the accident-and-emergency department having taken an overdose. During the previous 10 weeks the average had been 6·9. During the previous 10 years the average . . . was 6·7."

Sue Bishop of Birmingham's Sunday Mercury said:

"Shocking new evidence of the 'copycat' link between television violence and real life tragedies has been revealed by doctors in the Midlands. They say that during the week after the overdose drama in 'Eastenders' attempted suicide cases at their hospital almost DOUBLED. In one week more than 40 people were admitted after taking an overdose of drugs like Angie Watts in the BBC soap opera . . . And their message to viewers 'For heaven's sake don't copy what you see on television. Angie may have survived—but you could die'."

I think the link is incontrovertible.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I understand what the hon. Gentleman has said and it is regrettable if there was such a sequence of events. Is he suggesting that if the Bill were to become law, sequences as that drug-taking sequence in "Eastenders" would no longer be possible? I suggest that the Bill would do nothing about it.

Mr. Churchill: I was answering the point made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich who suggested that the broadcasting authorities are living up to their responsibilities. I do not believe that they are and I think this is clear evidence that they are not. That sequence was directly contrary to the BBC's guidelines for its programme producers.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor My hon. Friend has demonstrated the link between what is happening on television and people's behaviour. On exactly the same principle, violence is copied.

Mr. Churchill: There is no question about that. When I asked my local chief superintendent whether there was evidence of the public perpetrating copy cat crimes, he said, "You should see some of my constables. They think that they are Starsky and Hutch, whereas a few years ago ——

Mr. Dubs: It would have been Dixon of Dock Green.

Mr. Churchill: Indeed, it would have been Dixon of Dock Green.

10.30 am

The governing bodies should take their responsibilities more seriously and get a firmer grip on what is broadcast before further damage is done. Amendment No. 1 is defective in two respects. First, the cable authority is outside the Bill's scope. Cable programmes are subject to a separate offence of obscenity, to be found in section 25 of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984. In any event, that section bites on the providers of cable services, not on the Cable Authority which, unlike the broadcasting authorities, is not responsible for the content of programmes distributed by cable systems.

Secondly, the amendment omits to mention members of the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority, who are responsible for all programmes shown on that channel. In any case, the amendment is unnecessary. The duties and responsibilities of broadcasters are clearly laid down in the royal charter of the BBC and in the licensing and agreement with the Government. They are also set out with respect to the IBA and the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority in the Broadcasting Act 1981. Nothing in the Bill bears on their existing responsibilities. The existing requirement, which is to put out nothing which offends against good taste, will continue to be the test and nothing in the Bill implies otherwise. I must therefore ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was diverted from her case a little by interventions from Conservative Members, notably the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), on violence being shown on television. There is a good deal to be said on that subject. I had hoped that this would have been a decent Bill setting out standards, but I regret to say that it is not. If we have a decent Bill, we may do something about the violence on television.

I sat through the Second Reading and the whole of the Committee stage. There has been no sign from the Bill's sponsors that they see a reduction of the showing of violence on our screens as any part of their purpose. It has been sex, sex, sex, and nothing but sex.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that,, since 1982, the courts have included violence in the definition of obscenity so that, when applying the Bill to television, we are applying standards of obscenity which include violence? If he accepts that, does he accept that the Bill is necessary?

Mr. Mikardo: I do not accept that because the definition of obscenity is so blurred—we had this over and again in Committee—that nobody can say what it includes and what it does not. I can only go on the speeches that were made in Committee and on Second Reading. They were all about sex. Conservative Members kept on about "Sebastiane" and "Jubilee". I did not hear anything in Committee, although it has just been mentioned lightheartedly, about "Starsky and Hutch", "The Professionals" or any other programme that shows violence. It was clear throughout the Committee stage that the sponsors are obsessed about sex and that that is what the Bill is all about.

Mr. Churchill: I must remind the hon. Gentleman of what I and others said about "Jubilee" on Second Reading and in Committee. Although there was offensive language and an offensive portrayal of sex, the burden of the complaint from both sides of the House was its vicious cruelty and violence.

Mr. Mikardo: If I were looking for examples of violence, I would not have thought that "Jubilee" was a number one runner. It was so interestng to the hon. Member and others only because it links violence and sex.

Much emphasis has been put on copycat behaviour. Any senior police officer will confirm that newscasts most induce copycat behaviour. Do those who support the Bill propose that a horrendous rape should not be reported? According to the police, the greatest copycat influence comes from news reporting. A lot more people, especially young people, see "News at Ten" or the BBC's 6 pm news than ever saw "Sebastiane" or "Jubilee". Hon. Members must be careful when carrying their argument through to what, on the face of it, appears a logical conclusion, but which is nonsense.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich because her amendment deals with one of the things that has become apparent during debates on the Bill —the principal motivation of the Bill's sponsors is a crude and massive prejudice against the BBC and the IBA. The hem of their skirt shows all of the time. To judge from behaviour on one occasion, to which I shall refer on a later amendment, there are some Conservative Members who prefer the standards of The Sun to those of the BBC and the IBA. That is not much of a tribute to their standards or their sense of morality.

As it has come up again today, and doubtless will do so again, I want to try to dispose once and for all all of Conservative Members' obsession with "Sebastiane" and "Jubilee". I did not see "Jubilee", but I saw "Sebastiane". It had no tendency to deprave and corrupt.

Mrs. Dunwoody: It sent me to sleep.

Mr. Mikardo: It had a very strong tendency to bore me out of my mind. I object powerfully on two grounds to "Sebastiane" being shown. The first is that it was so boring and slow. Everything took such a long time. It took ages for anything to happen. I have always thought that those who engage in depravity are pretty sharp, alert and quick about it, but everything that happened in "Sebastiane" took ages and was very boring.

Secondly, I objected to the fact that the characters spoke their Latin with an accent different from that which the Romans used.

Mr. Mellor: Was the hon. Gentleman there?

Mr. Mikardo: That is a fair question, as a giggle across the Floor of the House. I am nearly as old as that, but not quite. We now know, by research, how the Romans pronounced their Latin. They did not pronounce it in the Italianate way that was used by the characters in "Sebastiane". I believe, therefore, that the BBC ought not to have shown it. I agree with Mr. Winner, with whom I crossed swords on one occasion on "Any Questions", about that.

The two groups of television authorities produce between them in excess of 30,000 hours of programmes a year. If we accept that those two films were an error of judgment, they represent a one hundredth part of 1 per cent. of the annual output of the BBC and the IBA contractors. All mortals are fallible. I wonder how many hon. Members could put their hands on their hearts and swear that during their activities both inside this House and outside it the clangers they have dropped amount only to a one hundredth part of 1 per cent. of those activities. If shackles are to be placed on the broadcasting authorities because we consider that they are unfit to do their jobs, perhaps we ought to consider whether we are fit to be Members of Parliament, because the clangers that we drop during our activities amount to more than a one hundredth part of 1 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich said that one will get what she, with here customary charitableness, called eccentrics taking up prosecutions. I say to the Minister, because he intervened on this point, that I am not altogether consoled by the fact that the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions is required. In recent years there has been a good deal of evidence that the Director of Public Prosecutions is highly selective about the speed with which he tackles different kinds of breaches of the law.

Mrs. Dunwoody: There was a great scandal about the sale of blood by the National Health Service to private sources, and I put down questions over a period of 17 months before any action was taken. When I asked why it had taken so long, I was told that the investigations had been complicated. However, other investigations are completed with astonishing speed.

10.45 am

Mr. Mikardo: My hon. Friend quotes a particularly graphic example. One would have to carry out only a few hours of research to find another dozen examples like it. Therefore I am not altogether consoled by what the Minister said on that point.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich said, this is not the Bill that was discussed on Second Reading. This is the fourth Bill. There was the original Bill upon which we voted. Then the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) produced a mark 2 version, which he then abandoned for his mark 3 version. After that he abandoned his mark 3 version for this Bill. As this Bill is different from that which we discussed on Seond Reading, we do not know for certain that the Bill as it now stands would have received a Second Reading. The hon. Gentleman quoted with pride his big majority at Second Reading. However, he does not know whether he would have obtained that kind of majority for this Bill. The hon. Gentleman's Bill contained matters that were so hair raising that it resulted in certain hon. Members salivating with recollection and in many votes being cast for his Bill that he would not have gained had it been this rather cold fish of a Bill.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the amendments that have been moved and accepted and that now form part of this Bill might in some respects have been regarded as beyond the scope of the original Bill?

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the hon. Member.

Mr. Mikardo: As you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is not a point of order. It is not relevant to the points that I was making. If the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) gained some satisfaction out of making his intervention, I wish him joy of it, but I do not have to take any notice of it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich is right to seek to ensure that we do not place further unreasonable shackles upon the broadcasting authorities. They go to great lengths to try to meet public opinion. Of course they will make mistakes once in a while, but nobody can charge them with showing indifference to the problems that we are discussing, and it would be wrong to seek to shackle them further.

Mr. Mellor: As the House knows from other interventions that I have made at other stages of the Bill, the Government are neutral on the proposition as to whether broadcasters should be made subject to the Obscene Publications Act 1959 or whether the exemption that they have always enjoyed should be continued. That remains the Government's view.

However, I make what I hope are a few helpful points about the amendment. It is apparent from the discussions so far that, with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), all those who have spoken or intervened have been at pains to point out that the guidelines that apply to both the IBA and the BBC are, in their terms, far tighter than anything that is prescribed in the 1959 Act. Most of them have either explicitly or impliedly indicated some dissatisfaction with the manner in which the guidelines are enforced by the broadcasting authorities. That is a matter for them. It is not a matter for me. However, I hope that the broadcasters will take seriously hon. Members' comments and some of the examples that they have given. There will be an opportunity for them to do so during the reconsideration of the BBC's guidelines that is being undertaken by a committee that is chaired by Mr. Wyatt.

Always at the heart of the issue has been the question whether the imposition of a long stop — nobody can assert that the 1959 Act would be any better than a long stop—would have the effect of toning up the system or, as some have contended, whether it would have the effect of placing even less emphasis upon the significance of the guidelines than is already the case. That is not a matter that I want to go into in detail, because it has been covered in the general issues. However, if the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) is concerned that the requirements under the BBC charter or the requirements that weigh on the IBA under the Broadcasting Act would be ousted by the Bill if it were to become law, I hasten to reassure her, as I tried to do in my intervention, that that would not be so. I hope that nothing that anyone has said is intended to do other than reinforce the duties of the broadcasters, which they clearly owe to Parliament, to observe the arrangements made under the charter and the Broadcasting Act.

If that were the case I could well understand that the hon. Lady might say, "Well why not make the declaratory statement?" That is effectively what her amendment suggests. I would have no objection to that although it is not in the end entirely a matter for me. The trouble is that the amendment is defective—I make no complaint of that — in two material particulars. First, it makes no reference to the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority, although that is an oversight that I can well understand because one does not necessarily think of that authority as much as the BBC. I see the hon. Lady hiding her face in shame, but she need not do so because there are no Welsh Nationalists here today.

Mrs. Dunwoody: We are all Welsh Nationalists.

Mr. Mellor: One stood in Putney at the previous general election but he did not do very well.

Mr. Dubs: Next time.

Mr. Mellor: We shall have to wait and see.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): He had an interesting sense of geography.

Mr. Mellor: Secondly, there is a reference in the amendment to the Cable Authority but cable is separately regulated under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984 and is outwith the scope of the broadcasting arrangements dealt with here.

I hope that, whatever else we may disagree about, the hon. Lady will accept two propositions. First, that the rules by which she sets so much store, as do I, will remain. They are not ousted by the Bill. Secondly, it is not unfortunately possible to accept the amendment as saying that they will remain. It would simply mean that there would need to be consequential amendments in the House of Lords which would be of no advantage.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) referred to an extract from "East Enders" and talked about copycat tendencies and the influence of television on behaviour. We all accept that television is the most powerful medium that there is. Those of us who are old enough to have seen the transition in Britain from a non-television society to a television society have a better idea of the increasing impact of television on all aspects of life.

Given that television is such a powerful influence, what part should be played either by the House or the BBC and IBA in saying that as there is a tendency to copy what is seen on television certain things should not be shown? The difficulty with that argument is that there is almost no end to it. Almost anything that can be seen on television might conceivably have a damaging influence on some viewers. Therefore, deciding where to draw the line is a difficult task which has defeated many people. Indeed, one of the reasons why there has been some criticism of the IBA and the BBC is because they may not have made the right decision.

Much as I regret the possibility that a drug-taking scene in "East Enders" led to a number of impressionable young people doing likewise, I find it difficult to say that therefore "East Enders" should not have shown that scene.

[Mr. Dubs]

I do not have the hon. Gentleman's advantage of having watched that incident, so I am basing what I say on his description of it. But I find it hard to say that a programme such as "East Enders" should not be allowed to depict incidents which happen, alas, all too frequently, judging from the newspapers.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that in a programme I watched the other day a representative from MIND strongly condemned that particular incident because of the very facts that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has mentioned. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support MIND in that particular instance.

Mr. Dubs: I respect MIND as an organisation, but without having seen the film it is hard to make a specific judgment or to contradict judgments made by others. All I would say is that overdoses of drugs are deeply regrettable, but they do happen, as British newspapers show. I find it hard to say that no film which depicts life as it may be should exclude incidents which are part of life, even if they are regrettable.

Mr. Churchill: The perniciousness of what was shown rested in the fact that the television personality Angie downed an overdose of barbiturates with a bottle of gin and was saved. That is what gives rise to the grounds for concern. Many impressionable young people, having just finished an unhappy love affair, may think that they could do the same thing and also be saved. The fact that there was such a significant increase in the suicide and attempted suicide rate that week can only be a matter for grave concern. Indeed, it has been accepted by the broadcasting authorities that that should not have gone out and they did not include it in the repeat.

Mr. Dubs: All I can say to that the is that responsibility lies more with the broadcasting authorities than with anybody else. But I still question whether, if the Bill becomes law, there is anything in it that would put a stop to such an incident.

That brings me to the heart of what I want to say. I deal with what the Minister said earlier. The objectives and aims which we share—that there are things from which impressionable young people should be protected—can best be achieved by the operation of the BBC and IBA guidelines rather than by legislation which, particularly in the context of the example that the hon. Gentleman has quoted, would not achieve that end.

Mr. Mikardo: My hon. Friend is right to say that if that criterion is applied, there is nowhere that it can end. For example, teetotal bodies might object to the fact that in the two series which have huge audiences — "Coronation Street" and "East Enders"—a lot of the action takes place in a pub. Does that mean that people should not be shown drinking in pubs for fear of copycat? What about smoking and the rest of it? What does it stop?

Mr. Dubs: My hon. Friend puts his finger on the real difficulty of where one stops if the example of television is such a powerful one.

I rest my case in the main on the fact that if we in the House are not happy about the way in which the guidelines operate, it is up to us to ask the BBC and the IBA what is the matter with their guidelines, either in the way that they are being applied or in what is contained within them. That sort of dialogue with the broadcasting authorities would do more to protect children and young people than anything in the Bill.

I do not share the belief that in drawing a parallel between television and cinema we can say that there are some films to which people under 18 are not admitted in the cinema and so that makes it all right. In fact, a young person — not a 10-year-old — in his or her mid-teens seems to find no difficulty in getting into a cinema, in London at any rate, even if there is an official bar on under 18-year-olds. But that is by the way.

I know from my discussions with the BBC and the IBA that they are genuinely concened about the public's perception of what they show and they are genuinely concerned about the views of hon. Members. I am convinced that if the House were to tell the authorities that we want to see changes in the guidelines or in the way in which the guidelines are implemented, there would at least be a willingness to discuss and enter into dialogue. That is a more useful path along which to go.

There is a matter of concern which is covered directly by the amendment. I feel that, despite the Minister's assurance—human nature being what it is—if there is legislation as a backstop the enthusiasm with which the BBC and IBA will apply their guidelines may be diminished to some extent. They will say that they do not need to worry too much about whether a film ought to be shown because there is the backstop of the new legislation. Because that might be the way in which it would operate, I am doubly concerned about the effect of this legislation. The effect might not simply be a blunt instrument. It might weaken the very protection which we are seeking to achieve.

There is another point to which hon. Members have referred and which I wish to discuss. I find the idea that, because some young people aged between 14 and 17 watch television until as late as midnight, all television ought to be based on that assumption, difficult to reconcile with the needs, ambitions and desires of an adult, mature society. I find it hard to accept what the hon. Member for Davyhulme said earlier, that television, under no circumstances, should show anything which would be unsuitable for a 15 or 16-year-old. The consequences for television as a medium of news, information and entertainment could be extremely damaging.

I did not believe that the hon. Gentleman intended his Bill to go that far, but what he said earlier suggests that he does. We have to strive for a balance. On the whole, I think that the broadcasters have the balance right. The balance is that early in the evening many children watch and programming ought to take note of that. However, later in the evening things change. I shall quote from the "IBA Family Viewing Policy":

> "But it is assumed that from 9.00 pm onwards parents may reasonably be expected to share responsibility for what their children are permitted to see."

It goes on to talk about what happens after 9.30 pm and 10.30 and so on. It says:

> "Violence is not the only reason why a programme may be unsuitable for family viewing. Other factors include bad language, innunedo, blasphemy, explicit sexual behaviour, and scenes of extreme distress."

Those factors go much wider than the Bill and I think that they are absolutely right.

Mr. Cash: Has the hon. Gentleman had the advantage of seeing the news released from IBA of 10 April? It says:

"If it wished, Parliament could extend the Broadcasting Act to include the references to depravity and corruption contained in the 1959 Obscene Publication Act — together with the defence available."

Elsewhere it says:

"If broadcasting were to be included in the proposed Bill the Members of the Authority would be exposed to possible criminal prosecution."

Effectively, it is saying that it does not mind tests of depravity and corruption being included but it does not want to be exposed to criminal prosecution. It is quite clear that a line has to be drawn and that is what we are trying to do in the Bill.

Mr. Dubs: Of course a line has to be drawn. I am saying that we get better protection by the line that can be drawn under the guidelines than the line that can be drawn by the legislation. The quotation that I have read from the "Family Viewing Policy" represents some of the most sensible words that I have heard on the subject.

Of course, the guidelines do work. We know that the IBA has deliberately not shown certain films. In a letter to me the IBA mentions some of the films it declined to transmit. It says:

"the IBA has declined to transmit a number of feature films including, for example, 'Straw Dogs', 'Last Tango in Paris' and 'The Exorcist'.

From my conversations with the IBA it is clear that it is well aware of the difficulties and it is aware that certain films should not be shown. A statement by the IBA says:

"Even if, as some believe, it was a mistake to show one or two particular films—irrespective of the context or timing—the transmission of particular programmes will always be a matter of judgment, and at the margins there will be disagreement. Public—and political—reactions to films such as 'Jubilee' and 'Sebastiane', or to other programmes at the margins of taste, are of course taken into account in the judgment of other programmes offered for transmission in the future."

That seems to be an indication of the sensitivity of the authority to pressure and public opinion.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. Gentleman consider that much of that is window dressing? The reason for what I say is a report in The Stage and Television Today of 27 March which says:

"Showings of Last Tango in Paris and, it is claimed Mad Max have been postponed indefinitely.

A Channel Four spokesman admitted there was a feeling that Last Tango with its notorious butter scene should not be shown in the current climate without substantial cuts which would mean it was not worth showing at all."

It is clear that if the Bill fails that film will appear on television.

Mr. Dubs: That is most unlikely. If the Bill fails I think that we will all still have a responsibility to keep pressure on the IBA and the BBC. I think that the hon. Gentleman may well have achieved something by drawing more attention to the guidelines and making the broadcasters more sensitive and aware of parliamentary and, above all, public opinion. It is public opinion and public attitudes which we have to take into account.

I do not want to go down the path of saying that because a child may be watching a television programme—by that I mean somebody of 17 — possibly as late as midnight, then every film that is shown on television should be based on the assumption that a handful of children may be watching late at night and we cannot have programmes which are suitable for adult viewing.

As I have said, drawing the line is difficult. Based on the excerpts that I saw from "Jubilee" I would have preferred it not to have been shown on television. Equally, I believe that there was nothing in "Sebastiane" to which anybody should take exception and which would make it unsuitable for child viewing. That view is based upon the excerpts that the hon. Member for Davyhulme arranged during the Committee stage. Those are subjective judgments based, as the IBA says, at the margins.

I think that the sensitivity of the broadcasters and their ability to take note of feeling and public taste is greater than the blunt instrument of a court of law. Indeed, if one of those films were to be taken to the court under the arrangement in the Bill and the prosecution were to fail, I suspect that the effects would be very damaging because it would open up the floodgates. By having the guidelines we can keep constant pressure on the authority.

There is one other point of detail which bothers me. I understand why an amendment in my name and that of my hon. Friends was not selected. However, I think that it is appropriate to mention it in the context of the responsibility of the broadcasting authority. Scotland and Northern Ireland are excluded from the Bill. I understand the technical reasons for that. However, many of the programmes we see on television are networked to Scotland and Northern Ireland. Indeed, I think with the exception of the main ITV channel the norm is that all programmes are networked. Even on the main ITV channel I believe that many programmes are networked throughout the United Kingdom.

I find it difficult to see how the broadcasting authorities can act on one set of legislations for England and Wales and a different set of legislations for Scotland and Northern Ireland. That seems illogical and a bit of a nonsense. That is another reason why the normal responsibilities of the BBC and the IBA have to be the main safeguard rather than this measure.

I agree with the aims of the hon. Member for Davyhulme. We all agree that children should be protected. However, it is not worthwhile to say "we must protect our children and, even if the method is defective, never mind we will have made our gesture." The needs of our children and our responsibilities to them are too important for futile gestures.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): I shall not refer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) too much because that might incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but is is absurd that the Bill will apply only to England and not to Scotland. If any of the IBA or BBC people wanted to transmit a programme they could easily take it up to Scotland and transmit it without being caught by the Bill.

I welcome the amendment because it illustrates vividly the main problem in the Bill. As the Minister said, the obligations or responsibilities of the governors and duties of the members of the IBA cannot be preserved in exactly the same way if the Bill becomes law. The Director of Public Prosecutions would become the editor-in-chief of broadcasting.

The argument was put lucidly in a letter to The Times today by the noble Lord, Lord Goodman. He is particularly nervous about the Bill's effects, although a good friend of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill). He said:

"I have over the years been actively engaged in considering the efficacy of legal censorship, particularly in relation to literature and films. I have arrived at the firm conclusion that these are not matters that can be effectively dealt with in the dock at the Old Bailey."

As the hon. Member for Battersea said, we are talking about individual taste. Over the years—nearly 60 years —we have set up a system of regulated broadcasting which by and large, with a few mistakes here and there, has stood the test of time and should not be pushed aside lightly. The Bill will substantially transfer the end responsibility for broadcasting to someone versed in the law from the members of the IBA and governors of the BBC who, through contacts with the boards of management and others in the programme companies, have built up an expertise in programme making, in audience reaction and in assessing public opinion at any given time.

If the problem were as simple as making sweets it would be easy because the law would be clear. This Bill, as it has emerged, is, as the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said, not the Bill that we discussed on Second Reading when I attempted to be called. I read the Committee proceedings carefully and the rapid changes made have changed the emphasis. That is not unreasonable. I was more against the original Bill than this Bill. The laundry list is now accepted as an absurdity.

The Bill makes it clear in its preamble that the presumption is that under 18-year-olds in their masses will be watching television at any time of the day or night and that the ultimate decision for prosecution is to be left to one man — the DPP — in spite of all the duties and obligations of the members of the IBA and the governors of the BBC.

If that were so, hon. Members who support the Bill would be gravely disappointed because the emphasis of all their speeches on Second Reading, in Committee, and now today, is that they want to stop the drip, drip, drip of constant violence. They want to stop those things which are affecting children. The Bill does not go near that. This is a Bill to deal with obscenity.

My personal and subjective judgment is that the extracts that I saw from "Jubilee" make me think that it should not be shown on television. I am more doubtful about "Sebastiane". There must be a subjective judgment at the margin. That attitude gives the Bill a fair wind. I am trying to interpret my hon. Friend's intentions as kindly as I can, but I see more sinister connotations in the Bill, especially when I look back to the proceedings on the Video Recordings Act introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright).

We should be worried about the slow drip, drip, drip of censorship. The optimism of some of my hon. Friends that we are going to do something about the Starskies and Hutches and "The A Team" worry me intensely. That should be left to the BBC governors and to the IBA members. If we do not like their decisions they should be told in forceful terms. The Home Secretary has the power to sack the members of those organisations. If their decisions are so unsatisfactory he should take that action.

I am not here to support obscenity, pornography or violence in any form. I hope that none of us are here for that. We all have different subjective judgments about what we mean by those words. That is the problem. Therefore, great and good bodies must, if we are to keep regulated broadcasting organised, look at the problems for us objectively.

My hon Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) asked the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) what she would do. I believe that many things can be done. The responsibilities and duties of the members of the IBA and BBC could be considerably enhanced as a result of my hon. Friend's Bill because it brings the problem to their attention.

The principle of screening more adult programmes as the evening goes on is vital if we are to protect quality and standards in British broadcasting. Is there not a case for suggesting to the BBC and IBA that there might be a more efficient way of warning parents that the more adult programming is coming up? I should not be averse to a form of certification at the beginning of a programme. If we want to become really puritanical we could take as an example the clock at the corner of the screen during breakfast television. Instead of a clock why not put a programme designation there? That would not disturb the drama too much.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull): Unless such information is provided it is impossible for parents to operate any form of self-censorship.

Mr. Brinton: Since I am a supporter of a Government interested in giving independence and freedom of choice to the individual, I believe that that is where the responsibility lies, with the help of the bodies that I have mentioned. If parents are given an idea of a programme's content by a simple symbol and by a symbol in the newspaper programme schedules they could say, "Johnny, you watch that and you're in trouble." If that is not enough we can go further. Some form of electronic lock could be installed easily and cheaply so that if parents are not in they can lock up their television—as opposed to their daughters.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Such locks exist and are used by people who pay to watch a particular channel.

Mr. Brinton: Such locking devices could be easily and cheaply installed.

There are many ways to tackle the problem which the majority of my hon. Friends want to cure. They are shocked by obscenity, but I seriously challenge them to name one programme—and I include the two films of which my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme is so fond—the case against which would succeed if brought before a jury.

My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme mentioned the letters that he had received about a schools programme. He made a marvellous case for my view that the responsibility for education on television and radio should rest with the Department of Education and Science and not with the BBC and the IBA. I do not know what audience was being aimed at in the Saturday morning programme that he was so shocked to hear about. Perhaps it was a sociology programme. I certainly do not approve of the contents of that programme, but there are other forms of protection that do not involve putting responsibility on the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The amendment may be flawed, but it is an insurance policy. If the Bill becomes law the amendment will at least remind everyone who interprets what we say that there were institutions known as the BBC and the IBA and that they did not do too badly although occasionally they made horrid howlers.

Mr. Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I sense from the speeches made so far that every hon. Member in the Chamber accepts that there are problems about television broadcasting and films that are being made available to young children under the existing arrangements.

The IBA has a 9 o'clock rule. It deems itself to be responsible for films and programmes shown before 9 pm. I am sure that all hon. Members received the 10 April letter from the IBA which describes its policy as being

"as far as possible not to broadcast material unsuitable for children at times when large numbers of children are viewing."

The letter says that there are constraints on that policy, one of which is that there is no time of the evening when there are not some children, perhaps even quite substantial numbers, watching television.

I have been in correspondence with the chairman of the IBA, Lord Thomson. I received a letter from him yesterday in which he said:

"Family Viewing Policy, as you know, assumes a gradual progression after 9.00 p.m. towards programmes likely to be unsuitabl for young children."

That is clear. The IBA says that it has control before 9 o'clock and that thereafter parents have the responsibility. Hon. Members who, like me, have young teenage children, know that 9 pm cannot be regarded as a sensible time for the IBA to decide to relinquish its responsibility. That is an absurd decision and not related to reality.

I accept that the existing policy is complicated and that there is no universal solution to the problem. The hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said that she wants to see some action, but there is not one solution to the problem. A number of elements will have to be taken into account, some of which will offer greater scope for improvement than others.

A major problem is the difficulty of reconciling the interests of young children and of adults. It would be illiberal to prevent parents from seeing the films that they like to watch. I should like to tighten standards, but it would be morally wrong for me to say that I am able to make decisions for other people. They have to make decisions for themselves.

The key responsibilities for introducing improvements rest with parents and the broadcasting authorities, particularly the IBA. Some may say that I am unfair, but my intuitive judgment is that the IBA churns out much more of the unacceptable stuff. The BBC's standards are generally higher, though I accept the drip, drip, drip argument.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): The hon. Gentleman makes a strong statement when he claims that the IBA is not maintaining standards. Can he give us a few examples? Can he give us a list of programmes, with transmission dates and times?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Evidence? We do not worry about evidence on this Bill.

Mr. Randall: I will try to answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Randall: In a moment. I shall be giving a specific example later.

Mr. Hayes: I agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about standards, particularly in the IBA and on Channel 4, but does he accept that, whether the Bill is passed or not, it has performed a tremendous service, because it has brought matters to public attention? As a result of our debates, I do not believe that the IBA would dare show films such as "Sebastiane" and "Jubilee" ever again.

Mr. Randall: The Bill is a sledgehammer and is impractical, but I concede that it has brought out the arguments, and that is healthy.

As for the proposed changes in the Bill, I am sceptical——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must address himself to the amendment. Hon. Members are tending to debate the whole Bill again.

Mr. Randall: The IBA is muddled about what its existing policy and the Bill can achieve. In his letter to me, the chairman of the IBA said that he felt that the Bill would bite only at the extremes of pornography and unacceptable films. He said:

"Although the precise parameters of what may be obscene may be altered, the Bill will at the end of the day only bite upon the extremes. It will not bear upon the kind of quite legitimate mainstream programming for grown-up people with which our discussions have been concerned."

Those are the discussions that I have had with the chairman.

"It will most certainly not provide the 'form of protection' you quite properly advocate. That is part of the function of the IBA and I am determined that we will despatch it effectively."

The press release of 10 April, which all hon. Members have received states that, with the introduction of the Bill,

"all programmes would have to be suitable for children since the Bill makes no distinction between viewing at different times of the day".

In addressing its responsibilities, the IBA seems to be rather muddled about the effects of the Bill.

11.30 am

Mr. Brinton: Far from being muddled, is not the IBA trying to echo rather more clearly the argument that I was trying to present, that the Bill will cause the IBA and BBC either to release their responsibilities and leave it to the ultimate—the Director of Public Prosecutions—which we would all consider to be very bad news, or to go for 18 and under-18 programming for the 24 hours? There are two alternatives. That is one of the difficulties with the Bill.

Mr. Randall: That is absolutely right. I will not go far down this path, in case, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you rule me out of order again. However, I would like the companies and the parents to deal with the problem rather than the courts, and I sense that many people share that view.

As for responsibility, I submitted some proposals to the chairman of the IBA just over a year ago after seeing on television a film called "The Squeeze". I frankly found that film offensive. I am reluctant to sound priggish, but I was not prepared to have such stuff shown in my house. I went to Lord Thomson's office and we discussed the matter. He told me that the IBA had reviewed the film again and found that it fell below standard. He gave me an assurance that it would not be shown in Britain again. The IBA had made a mistake.

Lord Thomson told me that very few people write to complain. When we consider the role of the IBA in these matters, hon. Members should make sure that they complain to the authorities, and should encourage the public to do so too.

Essentially we need to provide parents with the means of imposing their own controls and influence on young people. I remember the occasion when I saw "The Squeeze". I had had a very busy day. When I reached home I sat down with a drink to watch a film. According to the newspaper, Edward Fox was to appear in the film, and he is an actor whom I admire. I sat down to watch it. Unknown to me, pornography—that is all it was—was about to be shown.

I had no information on which to decide whether or not that film would be acceptable. I subsequently looked at various newspapers to see whether there were any critiques of the film or any information about it. There was no information at all.

I made the same point to Alasdair Milne, the Director-General of the BBC, and to Bill Cotton, who runs the television side of the business, as I made to Lord Thomson. I said that if they could provide such information, that would be a big step forward.

This is not just a whimsical idea. I propose that we adopt a scheme such as has already been implemented by at least one of the cable television companies. I have met Mr. Burchall, the chief executive of Premiere Television. He told me that his company has taken the responsibility into its own hands by providing viewers with information so that they can decide for themselves.

We do not want mere gestures. We are addressing a specific amendment, and we are doing so because we want some action to ensue. Should we enable parents to decide on such matters themselves, or do we prevent them from doing so? In my view, we should provide parents with appropriate information. We could use little codes in the newspapers. A film containing bad language would be given an exclamation mark. For a horror film there would be a little axe dripping blood; for a family film, a profile of a family. Such a scheme is in operation, and Mr. Burchall told me that a very high proportion of viewers find it acceptable. The codes could also appear on trailers. We would go some way towards overcoming the problem that we face if we gave people the choice and the information on which to decide for themselves and their families.

Mr. Churchill rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

Question again proposed, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

11.45 am

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): It is sad that this Bill will fail because of lack of parliamentary time. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has blazed a trail and one day in the near future we shall probably see an improved Bill. I should like to thank him for drawing the attention of the public to a pressing need.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who proposed the amendment, laid great emphasis on the fact that there was little evidence to justify this legislation. The hon. Lady alleged that she received more letters about Sunday trading than she received about the Bill. She sought to imply that that showed a lack of support from the general public for the Bill. I must record that I have received over 20,000 letters in support of child protection. That shows how deeply the general public feel about these matter.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I did not seek to show anything of the sort. I was trying to make it clear that Members of Parliament traditionally receive large numbers of letters about many pieces of legislation. The suggestion that, because the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has received a large number of letters, that represents a unique occasion, is misrepresenting the normal situation.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Armstrong): Order. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to stray a bit, but he must come back to the amendment.

Mr. Dickens: I shall return to the amendment and answer the points made by the proposer. The 1985-86 television season got off to a chilling start. One in three programmes shown after 6.30 pm on all four channels during the first week in September contained scenes of physical violence. "Jubilee" and "Sebastiane" have been well cited, but setting those aside, we saw, for example, a man having his throat cut with a kitchen knife and a close-up of the victim's throat. A man hit a woman with his fist and then battered her to the ground with a stick while the camera focused on her bloodied face. There was a sheriff with a pickaxe in his chest. Two men and a woman were portrayed beating a victim to the floor with wooden clubs, with blood seeping into the carpet. There was also a villian holding a pistol to his victim's head and then injecting him with a hypodermic needle thrust into his nose.

Today, young people watch about 23 hours of television each week. Experts believe that, by a child's late teens, he could have witnessed 16,000 violent deaths.

Let us consider the evidence. Since the ratings battle began, when commercial television arrived in 1955, violence has emerged as a crucial ingredient in television entertainment. During that same period, the number of reported crimes of violence against the person rose from 7,884 to 114,187 per year, and the number of rapes known to the police rose from 340 each year to 1,433.

Many studies have cited television as a significant factor in that increase. Back in 1969, President Johnson's National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence ansserted:

"Violence on television encourages violent forms of behaviour".

More recently, in 1982, a major report by America's National Institute of Mental Health recognised:

"Violence on television does lead to aggresive behaviour by children and teenagers who watch the programmes."

A research project in Newhaven, Connecticut, observed three and four-year-olds at eight day-care centres over a full year. It was found that the children who watched the highest number of violent television programmes clearly showed the most aggressive behaviour. Canadian researchers in Manitoba came to the same conclusion.

Some of the most detailed research has been conducted in the United Kingdom. From 1972 until 1978, Doctor William Belson of the North-East London polytechnic studied the behaviour of 1,563 London boys aged between 13 and 16. His conclusion was:

"Television violence has a slow drip-drip effect on a young person, gradually eroding the training of parents and society against using violence".

Dr. Belson found that the heavy television viewing boys had committed 50 per cent. more violent acts. For example, they had used knives or broken bottles, and had vandalised cars and public conveniences.

Since 1975, the average age for the onset of disruptive behaviour in primary schools has dropped to between three and five years. That was revealed after a study by Dr. Jean Lawrence and David Steed of London's Goldsmith college, which was published in the journal of the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association. Only last summer the study charted a four-year-old who had injured his classmates, a five-year-old who had forced a friend's face onto a cloakroom peg and an eight-year-old who had been wrenched away from kicking and punching a teacher by two adults.

Television is a major contributor to violence. That is as clearly and scientifically established as the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung cancer. The Bill's provisions provide protection against the rapidly escalating instances of violent, sadistic and sexual crimes, as shown on television. If the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich feels that the Bill is such an irrelevance, why are the IBA and the BBC so excited about what we wish to do? The reason is that there are producers who are not following the guidelines, and who are inflicting the most dreadful material on our young people. One day the House will pass the necessary legislation, and we will protect our children from such filth.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The Bill has emerged significantly improved from its Committee stage. Indeed, it has been changed out of all recognition, and perhaps that is why it has been improved. I share the widespread public concern over some of the things covered by the Bill. Like the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), I believe that the real problem is violence. I am not sure why the hon. Gentleman concentrated on violence rather than on sexual matters, as the Bill seems to cover the latter. Perhaps it was because of his significant contribution a few weeks ago to The Sun. The article in The Sun said:

"political heavyweight Geoffrey who represents Littleborough and Saddleworth is one of those red-blooded members confident of killing Labour kill-joy Clare Short . . . The jolly MP said 'girls would give their right arm for a figure like Tracey's'. Another cracker tomorrow."

Perhaps that is why the hon. Gentleman concentrated on violence today.

Mr. Dickens: As the hon. Gentleman mentioned me by name, I am grateful to him for giving way. Contrary to the view put about by the Opposition, that article illustrates that I am not a prude or so obsessed with sexual matters that I have to support such a Bill. I am certainly not a prude. But the protection of children and shielding them from obscene and explicit material is a quite different matter.

Mr. Mitchell: I wholeheartedly accept the hon. Gentleman's assurance that he is not a prude. However, we at least agree that violence rather than sex is a problem. But that violence comes not so much from British programmes, although it is creeping into them, as from imported American programmes, which place an emphasis on violence. Indeed, Americans lead a much more violent way of life, which is reflected in their programmes. But the problem is that the Bill does not do anything about the violence that the hon. Gentleman and I complain about. That is why I want to amend the clause.

If the Bill makes protest noises about violence but does nothing about it, it is merely dealing in gesture politics. I do not see such politics as necessary. There is great intellectual confusion among the Bill's advocates. They create a climate of fear and alarm and then introduce this Bill as a solution to it. Yet it is irrelevant to most of those fears and alarms. Some years ago the report of the Williams committee said that to regard

[Mr. Mitchell]

"pornography as having a crucial or even a significant effect on essential social values is to get the problem of pornography out of proportion with the many other problems that face our society today."

There is a climate of fear and alarm. Yet to concentrate, as the Bill does, solely on sexual matters is to ignore the problem of violence, and the other factors that create that kind of fear and alarm.

The teeth have been taken out of the Bill, but it has been left with enough gums to chomp and chew at the institution of broadcasting. That is why I support the amendment. It takes effective steps to protect broadcasting from the dangers inherent in the haphazard interventions that the Bill would generate.

Self-discipline on the part of broadcasting institutions and the audience is the solution to the problem, if there is one. That would be better than allowing unpredictable interventions, as the Bill does, and then allowing broadcasting to be subject to the criteria of its effects on 13 and 14-year-olds, who might be viewing at any time of the day. To reduce everything to the level of what is acceptable to them, particularly late at night, is to create a television of wall-to-wall Blue Peter rather than a television of entertainment, interest, involvement and information about the world as it is. We cannot subject tastes on such matters to that level of intervention and discrimination.

People who do not take the trouble to discipline their children and the viewing habits of children who should not be watching television very late at night or watching the programmes which cause complaints, are effectively asking the State to discipline their children for them through legislation. They are imposing the consequences of their indiscipline on the rest of society. That approach is out of proportion to the problem.

The problem concerns those children who are not controlled or subject to parental discipline, who are viewing programmes which they should not late at night. I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). He said that nine o'clock in the evening was not an appropriate cut-off time for the IBA to hand the discipline of viewing back to parents. That cut-off point should come later.

12 noon

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West also made the point about the need for information. More information leads to informed choice and that is what society is about. We need to know what is in the programmes and what the consequence of those programmes will be. That information should be freely available.

The real problem is that such information will not reach the young people who are watching at times when they should not be watching and whose viewing taste is being made the dominant factor in the approach of the Bill. The information would not reach that crucial group of people.

Mr. Randall: Would my hon. Friend agree that the information must reach the parents? It is impossible for parents to impose any form of parental control without that information being fully available in a form that will describe precisely what the film may contain.

Mr. Mitchell: I hope that I was making that point. I agree that that information should be available to parents and to young people. We should know what problems exist. The information would assist in making the viewing choice and help the assertion of parental discipline. The key problem is, however, parental discipline imposed on children. The rest of society should not be censored as a result of programmes being made acceptable and suitable for 13 or 14-year-olds. The universe is very different and adults' appreciation of it differs from that of children. The information should be available.

The essence of freedom is the freedom to make mistakes and choices. That is the freedom of a free society and the approach to that is through self-discipline and discipline by the broadcasting authorities rather than an imposed framework of state discipline subject to totally unpredictable interventions by the Director of Public Prosecutions acting at the behest of moral groups or through the pressures and panics of others.

I would like to stress that cable television offers the possibility of a universal choice of viewing with up to 40 channels. It offers a much wider choice of viewing. It should not therefore, be subject to the same controls and that is why the amendment does not deal with authority in that area. The essence of cable television is the freedom to choose what one wants to see. We must have the information, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West stressed. Choice is the essence of cable, and not the lowest common denominator programmes on the on-air channels at present.

Freedom means the freedom to experiment and to state one's view of the world as an artist and producer or as someone making a television programme. The broadcasting authorities must then decide at what time it is appropriate for that programme to be broadcast.

I would, frankly, prefer to leave the clause out of the Bill. The amendment expresses my only real objection to the Bill. I oppose the extension of the obscene publications legislation to the broadcasting institutions and I believe that the rest of the Bill, as drafted, deserves my support. However, I believe that the extension of the obscene publications legislation through this clause to the broadcasting institutions creates a dangerous situation in which the authorities will be subject to unpredictable interferences. The self-discipline that is so essential will be weakened because the authorities will become less responsible. I would have preferred the amendment to have been left out of the Bill. I am sure that if the amendment is dropped the Opposition would allow the Bill to pass without any other difficulties.

However, the amendment is before us and the Report stage of this House functions in such a way that we cannot deal with clause stand part, we can proceed only by amendment and that is what we are doing now. We are seeking to offset the dangers created by the extension of the obscene publications legislation to the broadcasting institutions.

Other amendments have not been selected. I would have like the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) to have been selected and I am sure that it would have been selected had she withdrawn her Bill on that matter. It is difficult to select an amendment that relates to another Bill before the House. I would have liked the House to have dealt with that problem as it would have exposed the hypocrisy whereby Tory Members of Parliament appear day after day in The Sun newspaper to endorse its nudes and then pose as the advocates of the moral majority, censorship and discipline—as the new puritans against excess.

We have not been privileged to deal with that matter as amendment No. 25 was not selected. Mrs. Mary Whitehouse is a strong advocate of the Bill and I do not criticise her. Indeed, in my view, she has performed a valuable service. She is a populist and I have great affinities with populism. She has demonstrated to the House, to the country and to the broadcasting organisations the degree of public concern about these issues. We tend to live in an ivory tower in this House and we are sometimes out of touch with public opinion.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Before my hon. Friend becomes completely ecstatic about the virtues of Mrs. Mary Whitehouse, does he agree with her condemnation of radio and television broadcasts and films which she has not seen?

Mr. Mitchell: I cannot answer for Mrs. Mary Whitehouse. She has, however, reminded us about a level of concern which all too often we forgot in the House. We must use our judgment on what Mrs. Whitehouse said, on her arguments and the views expressed through her organisation. Those matters are still subject to our judgment. The danger is that in revealing the extent of that opinion she creates a panic reaction in which people are forced, through panic and public pressure, to make changes which are undesirable and which are put forward as solutions to the problems Mrs. Whitehouse articulates.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North) rose——

Mr. Mitchell: In other words, emption drives out rationality in these argument. It is right that concerns should be expressed.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) came a little nearer than he would have wanted to slurring Mrs. Whitehouse. This week, Mrs. Whitehouse sent to various hon. Members including myself, detailed researches into BBC television programmes detailing precisely, line by line, her objections against them. It is not really fair to pretend that she does not see what she is criticising.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not seeking to praise Mrs. Whitehouse with faint damns. Rather, I believe that she has performed a valuable service in articulating a substratum of opinion, an element of opinion that exists, of which we should be aware. She has also performed valuable work in providing that information and I accept that implicitly. However, arising from such concerns and pre-occupations put forward by Mrs. Whitehouse and others, there is an obsession with matters sexual rather than what I believe is the larger side of the problem, violence.

Secondly, because of the pressure that is created by those opinions, we are prone to knee-jerk, gesture reactions that are designed to passify and to show that the House is doing something. These reactions are dangerous, because they do not deal with the problems that is the source of the complaints.

It is important that we as Members of Parliament exercise our rationality and our judgment. We must be aware of concerns and seek to deal with them realistically. We must not be stampeded into taking actions that are possibly more harmful than the disease. In dealing with issues to which the Bill addresses itself the House can be stampeded into panic reactions. It can be caused to rush in to show that it is doing something in response to public concern. When that happens we express our concern but we do not solve the problem itself.

The real problem is violence. Those who accept violence on television justify their opinions by saying that violence is a part of life. Violence is not a part of my life, not even when I am involved in internal relationships within the Labour party. Violence is not a part of life of the great majority of our constituents. We are exposing people, especially young people, to a level of violence that they will not see in their own life. Violence might have been seen 40 or 50 years ago when life itself was far more violent but now it is not. Yet we are being exposed to a steady drip of violence, and I agree with the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth that people become innured to it. There is an accumulation—a sedimentation — of violence. Where I disagree with the hon. Gentleman is on the effect that the Bill will have. In my opinion the Bill will do nothing to reduce the amount of violence that is shown on television. That is the essence of the problem.

The IBA code recognises the reality of violence and how to deal with it. It addresses itself to the problems that arise when people are exposed to violence. I do not think that the code is satisfactory.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I agree wholeheartedly with what the hon. Gentleman has been saying. I understand his reasons for opposing the Bill and I recognise that it has an enormous defect in that it does not deal with the problem of violence. What does the hon. Gentleman think that the authorities should do that they are not already doing?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall attempt to answer the hon. Gentleman's question in a moment. I have found a copy of the code to which I was hoping to refer, which deals with violence in a rather academic fashion. It states:

> "It may be asked why violence has to be portrayed at all on the screen. The answers are clear. First, conflict is the essence of drama, and conflict often leads to violence. Second, the real world contains much violence in many forms, and when television seeks to reflect the world in fact or in fiction it would be unrealistic and untrue to ignore its violent aspects."

It continues:

> "The regular and recurrent spectacle of violence might lead viewers to think that violence in one form or another is being given the stamp of approval. Once violence is thus accepted and tolerated people will, it is believed, tend to become more callous, and more indifferent to suffering imposed on the victims of violence."

That reservation is right for I think that that is what happens. Violence is being shown almost for the sake of violence, and that is especially true of American productions. It may be that life in America is much more violent than it is here, but it seems that imported American productions contain violence as an element of production, as though it must be present. It seems that those who produce them take the view that there must be an element of humour, a handsome hero, a malevolent villain and a quota of violence.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that the issue of imported programmes is even more unclear because of the operation of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876? I tabled a new clause that was designed to deal with the problem and, regretfully, it has not been selected.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree that the Bill does not deal with that problem. It is unfortunate that it does not deal with other problems as well.

I was addressing myself to the way in which we should deal with the problem of violence. We shall not deal with it effectively by introducing Bills of this sort. In doing so, we are pursuing a hare down another alley, a hare which is irrelevant to what I, the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth and others see as the main problem. The only effective way to deal with the matter is by directing the pressure of opinion within the House and outside on the broadcasting authorities and causing them to recognise reality, which is that a steady accumulation of violence shown on television innures viewers to violence and creates an expectation in the minds of young people that violence is a part of life when it is not. This makes people behave in a violent fashion. They have seen it on television and they are innured to it. That is the danger. We must recognise the nature of the problem, focus on it and deal with it by putting pressure on the broadcasting institutions, which are very much open to pressure.

12.15 pm

Mr. Cash: In the video working party's report, which came out in 1983, there was a specific reference to the problem of violence on television. It stated clearly that "on grounds of social responsibility, broadcast television has also avoided giving the details of drug use".

The programme "East Enders" is a good example of the broadcasting authorities ignoring their social responsibility despite understanding it. Against that background I should like to know what the hon. Gentleman thinks could be done to solve the problem.

Mr. Mitchell: There is not much purpose in putting that question to me. The question should be put to the hon. Member for Davyhulme, the author of the Bill. We should ask ourselves what the Bill does to resolve the problem, and the answer is nothing.

It is important that concern is being expressed about the portrayal of violence on television screens. It is important also that it is not channelled into a blind alley where it will thrash around impotently. It should not be thought that something will be achieved by enacting the Bill, when it will not, so that the heat is taken off the broadcasting authorities and necessary changes are not made.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that "obscenity" does not include violence. There have been court cases since 1982 in which it has been stated that violence is included in obscenity. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman is asking me to trust his expertise as a lawyer and to accept that violence will be dealt with by the Bill, I must decline to do so. Violence is not dealt with explicitly in the Bill and I see no way in which the clause, even as we hope to amend it, will deal with it. The more effective course is to frame a code of practice which recognises the problem and deals with it directly. At present we are running down blind alleys and talking about sex, indecency and human sexual relations when the real problem is the changed attitude to violence which is implicit in the constant deluge of violence from television screens.

In general, self-discipline is the answer. In general, I think that proper guidelines are the right approach. That is the way in which the industry should go. We should not seek to interfere, especially when our interference is unpredictable. The codes on violence need strengthening because there is a problem, which has concerned many of us for a long time, which they do not deal with satisfactorily. The Bill would not deal with the problem satisfactorily, either. I refer to trailers of programmes which show scenes of violence in programmes that are to be shown later in the evening, which are put out at peak viewing time. Violence is used as something of production value.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is my hon. Friend aware that changes in EEC legislation will mean that the amount of American material shown on our television screens may increase considerably? With the introduction of new satellites we shall find ourselves with very few means of controlling the material in the way in which we can at present. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a good idea to consider that problem as well?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend must not tempt me to talk about Brussels, from whence all blessings flow. I should like to cut down the number of imported American programmes. Such programmes go out at peak viewing times and have a steady build-up effect.

I have been slightly diverted, for which I apologise. I conclude that the case for the Bill is not proven and, indeed, that the Bill is counter-productive. The real approach must be to make the IBA and the BBC aware of the strong public concern about violence. They should tighten up their codes of conduct. This clause does not tighten up those codes. Such controls will not be effected by chasing off down the blind alley of this clause but through pressure from this House and outside.

Mr. Key: I support the Bill. I have listened to the arguments of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in support of her amendment but I hope to illustrate why I cannot support it.

I am not quite as impervious to the opinions of my constituents as the hon. Lady appears to be on this issue. Sometimes legislation is ahead of public opinion—one could cite the Shops Bill—but usually it is behind public opinion. This is the case with the Bill. We must seek a balance between reflecting public opinion and forming it. Legislation sets the tone for everyone in the community, not just those who break the law. The point is not that all programmes should be suitable for children. There is also the effect of the programes on adults especially the weaker adults in our society. Television often reinforced taboos, it reinforces male chauvenism and sexism.

I have received a great deal of representation on this matter. The director of the Diocescan Board for Social Responsibility summed it up when he said:

"We must start making connections on crucial issues which affect the moral and social well-being of our citizens and especially for our young people."

For that reason, it is important to address ourselves to the responsibilities of the IBA and the BBC. I notice that there is only one hon. Lady present, although there were three from time to time. Those responsible in the BBC and the IBA are not responsive to women's views on this issue. Women are sick and tired of seeing their bodies used for men's sexual gratification wherever they look on films, TV, video nasties, magazines, advertising, sex shops, art, entertainment and so on.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman also agree that women are sick of not having equal representation in this House and that that is one reason why there are so few of us here?

Mr. Key: I am delighted to hear the hon. Lady say that, because there are more hon. Ladies in the Conservative party than there are in her party.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is because there are more Conservative Members.

Mr. Key: I have always supported the need for equal representation in the House and we would discuss this matter in a more rational manner if there were more hon. Ladies in the House.

The Salisbury Women's Media Watch Committee has been constructive in its attitude to women. It states:

"The underlying attitude of society is that sex and women should be available for men on their terms and when they require it."

The committee believes that men must learn to be responsible and control their sexuality as women have always done. I agree with that, but what is the IBA and the BBC doing about it?

Most civilisations and nations measure their success in terms of the pursuit of the peace, beauty and culture which they bequeath to future generations. What will we be remembered for? There are more musicals in London than on Broadway — both in the west end and in the provinces—and our theatre is better than anywhere else in the world, but why do we under-value our international success by obscenity on television?

Recently, The Sun newspaper had a go at me because I was not prepared to vote against the Shops Bill. In its leader "The Sun Says" it claimed that a number of us did not have the guts to vote at all. I wish The Sun would not see all the issues in black and white terms. Sometimes its judgments appear to be upside down, but perhaps that is natural in view of the nationality of the proprietor. The Sun implied that those of us who did not vote somehow let the side down; it asked how much freedom of choice we favoured. I shall attempt to illustrate how much freedom I would favour with regard to the Bill and where I draw the line.

On the day on which The Sun castigated me, many incidences of sex and violence were recorded in that newspaper—on pages 3, 7, 11, 13, 15, 16, 22 and 24. I believe that The Sun and other newspapers could be an immense force for good if they seriously consider the issues involved.

I believe that a culture of violence is being actively created not just by the makers of video nasties but by the makers of violently aggressive pop music. That in its turn spawns punk fashion and anti-social behaviour. The men with the money behind the video makers must share the blame.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am very interested in what my hon. Friend says but can he give me an example of violently aggressive pop music?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that that relates to the duties of the IBA or the BBC.

Mr. Key: I am aware of my hon. Friend's professional interest—and expertise in the pop world, and I shall have a word with him afterwards about it.

Those who finance, write, produce or sanction television programmes tend to portray explicit sex and violence as normal and acceptable. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that there is concern about such violence, but I rather doubt it.

I utterly condemn the irresponsibility of the National Campaign for the Reform of the Obscene Publications Acts, affiliated to the National Council of Civil Liberties, which is urging us to defeat this Bill. It has written to a number of Members of Parliament that it regards the Bill as a

"monstrously authoritarian measure, quite unnecessary and totally unacceptable in a society in which freedom of choice and freedom of expression are supposed to be paramount."

I do not believe that freedom of choice and freedom of expression are paramount and I believe that the BBC and the IBA should take that into account. The NCROPA also believes that the Bill represents "an outrageous incursion on free artistic and cultural creativity."

It suggests:

"even if there were any justification in the need to take some action 'protect' children from possible exposure to sexual and/or violently explicit material (they are not inseparebly intertwined, as many seem to assume), Parliament has seen fit to legislate in a much less rigid and prohibitive fashion with regard to many other products."

Mr. Brinton: Does not the hon. Gentleman concede that the NCROPA has one point: that the Obscene Publications Act urgently needs reform before any new amendments can be added to it?

Mr. Key: That may be so, but it does not detract from the fact that it is trying to persuade hon. Members to squash the Bill for what I believe are fundamentally misguided reasons. We are discussing the matter because of the failure of the IBA and BBC guidelines.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich talked of the need for evidence. The connection between violence on television and the increase in violent crime is self-evident. We have also found that children can repeat the details of the last crime that they saw on television, when asked or in play. Crime and fear are thus increased.

Judgments at the Old Bailey regularly accept the defendant's statement that he has been influenced by what he has seen or read. It is accepted that defendants copy acts of indecency and violence. Such behaviour is well researched and was quoted at length in the study, "Video Violence and Children" in 1985, which was edited by Geoffrey Barlow and Alison Hill for the parliamentary group video inquiry. The organisation Kidscape has produced a mass of similar evidence.

12.30 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman has picked on the same argument as me and the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). The central question, however, is what the Bill has to do with the evidence on violence and what it does to check the deluge of violence from the screens and its influence.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has addressed those arguments adequately and I shall not repeat them. I am convinced by those arguments and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not.

The nation's opinion on the issue is slow to crystallise but, as with the link between smoking and cancer, the link between pornography, violence and sex abuse is accepted. Those who support the amendment have not addressed the fact that one in 10 British adults are sexually abused as children and that 75 per cent. of sex assaults on children are committed by people they know.

[Mr. Key]

I should like to give some examples of the IBA's and the BBC's irresponsibility. I understand that, on 30 April, Thames Television is to screen an explicit programme on incest immediately after "Playschool." The IBA rescheduled the programme, but changed its mind. Why? We are asked to trust broadcasting authorities' judgment and then that happens.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I do not take it upon myself to defend the IBA—I have my arguments with it—but the hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He cannot say that many people are sexually abused as children and then complain if television addresses itself to that real and frightening problem. I have not seen the programme, so I do not know what it shows or says but we shall never break out of the horrifying cycle—the crime has gone on for thousands of years—unless children, especially, are taught to realise that they have no involvement in the guilt attached to incest and told what support is available to those who are subjected to it.

Mr. Key: I entirely agree that we must break out of the cycle, but I believe that the cycle is being reinforced and aggravated.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) mentioned the news. Recently, the first item on the news, whether breakfast television, midday news, the 6 pm news or the late night news, has been a horrific rape case. There is no time for a mother to rush to the set and switch it off when the news comes on after children's television. News producers and editors have a responsibility to take account of the time at which the news bulletin appears, and its substance.

Like others present, I have read the guidelines. They are woefully inadequate. They refer to not dwelling on the heartache of parents or victims, but how often do we see that? I do not want to talk about censorship in terms of cutting out news items, but I want much greater sensitivity in their presentation. There is no need to censor the news, but there is every need to ensure that it is presented in the least offensive way possible, while retaining the facts.

Mr. Mikardo: The hon. Gentleman is making a false point. He is advocating qualitative censorship. Censorship in totalitarian countries begins by influencing the content, and eventually it cuts it out altogether. The hon. Gentleman cannot get away from his dilemma. He is advocating the censorship of news programmes. Does he want to censor the News of the World and the other lascivious stuff that appears in newspapers?

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me to stray from the amendment and to say more about The Sun than I have already said about its reporting of events.

Mr. Brinton: My hon. Friend has raised a very important point about television news. I have here a letter from the editor of Independent Television News that was written to Michael Grade on 19 February. It takes his point entirely and it should be put on the record. It says:

"We at ITN are acutely aware of our responsibility to avoid the transmission of gratuitously offensive material, and are sensitive to the need for restraint during those hours when large numbers of children are likely to be watching."

What is wrong with that?

Mr. Key: Because they have utterly failed. I was watching "Breakfast Time" this week with my small children. The first item was an explicit description of rape and murder. That is why that letter is worthless.

I introduce another point that I hope the Opposition will not take in a party political sense. A Labour party political broadcast used a child actor to portray a horrific scene in which a little girl left home, went through an underpass, heard footsteps and ran. It was meant to illustrate a perfectly respectable political point about law and order. This broadcast was drawn to my attention by a children's organisation. My worry is that that broadcast did not portray a law and order issue. Children need to be educated about how to cope with that kind of situation, but the broadcast showed that that child was afraid of the police. I am sure that that was not the intention of the broadcast, but it showed that the broadcasters do not perceive the problem from the child's point of view.

No research that I have seen supports the view that there is no link between sex and violence on television. The BBC and the IBA are largely responsible for that. I applaud the ITV code of October 1971. It says:

"This Code cannot provide universal rules. The programme maker must carry responsibility for his own decisions. In so sensitive an area, risks require special justification. If in doubt, cut."

That is extremely good advice.

The onus is upon those who oppose the Bill to provide a constructive solution. It is not, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) suggested, the media who need to be protected. It is our children who need to be protected. We teach children to cross the road safely and to be able to go near to water without being harmed. We do not find this difficult, because these are accepted risks. Not to teach children road safety and water safety would be considered foolish by most adults. Children are also warned about the dangers of talking to or going with strangers, not because the vast majority of adults would harm children but because a few deviants might. The vast majority of children are assaulted by those they know.

Children must not just be warned about strangers. That is similar to warning them when they cross the road to watch out only for red cars. We must break through the taboos that prevent parents from discussing these issues and try to persuade the IBA, the BBC and all programme producers that they must adopt a responsible attitude. If we get no further than that with this Bill, we shall have achieved something.

Mr. Chris Smith: I should say at the outset that I have an interest to declare in that I have a close working relationship with the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians, the film technicians trade union. That means that I have a particular interest in the impact of clause 1 and the amendment that we are discussing.

The debate on this amendment has been characterised so far by almost universal agreement from both sides of the Chamber on two points—first, that there is a lot of genuine concern about the impact of television particularly of the portrayal of violence and, secondly, that there is a need to protect children. Those points are held in common by both sides of the House and by both proponents and opponents of the Bill.

The key question that has arisen, and which I fear has not really been answered by anybody who has spoken against the amendment and in favour of the clause as it stands, is whether the Bill will bring us any nearer to those goals which we all share. I fear that my answer is that it will not. In some ways, it takes us a bit further away from those goals.

Conservative Members have strongly and genuinely made the point that in the face of what is happening in television, particularly the portrayal of violence on television, there is a need for Parliament, in the words of the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), to do something about it.

Justified as that response may be, it is no sensible basis for legislation. It has been said that it is the duty of the House to remind broadcasters of their responsibilities. I agree. It is the duty of all of us as Members of Parliament to reflect public concerns, to speak out about them and to remind broadcasters of what the public are concerned about.

However, it is not the job of the House to put on the statute book legislation which is defective simply because we wish to carry out by that process that business of reminding broadcasters of their responsibilities. There are other ways of doing that.

Let me refer Conservative Members to the debate that we had on a Friday morning many months ago in the House, before the Bill even had its Second Reading, on the impact of violence on young people and the rising tide of violent crime among young people. I spoke out then about my anxiety about a number of types of programme which are shown on television. That is the way in which we should be getting the message across, not by putting on the statute book legislation which will not tackle the problem about which we are all concerned.

Mr. Cash: In a letter in The Times today, which I think has been quoted, Lord Goodman says that at the end of the day it is up to the people who are running the programmes to exercise a degree of social responsibility and that that is the way to solve the problem. That is really what the hon. Gentleman is saying. The video working party, in its report on violence on television, says that drug use should not be shown on television because of the problem of social responsibility. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that MIND has said that the drugs scene in "East Enders" has an adverse effect upon young people resulting in more suicides and that that is a sign of the failure of all the interconnecting alternative suggestions? That demonstrates that what the hon. Gentleman is saying has failed and that something else must be put in its place in order to prevent those young people from committing suicide.

12.45 pm

Mr. Smith: I am at something of a disadvantage in replying to the hon. Gentleman specifically. At present I do not read The Times so I have not seen Lord Goodman's letter. That is an act of self-censorship. It is an active choice that I am exercising as a Member of the public and which parents can exercise when they turn off the television set. It is precisely the point which my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was making some time ago.

Mr. Churchill rose——

Mr. Smith: I shall finish replying to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) then I will give way.

I did not see the specific episode of "East Enders" to which much reference has been made. Of course, if there is concern of the kind which the hon. Gentleman has identified, that is precisely the sort of issue which must be considered extremely carefully by the governors of the BBC, the board of the IBA and to which the guidelines which they issue must address themselves. If there are such failures the House should be bringing pressure upon the governors of the BBC and the board of the IBA to consider those matters much more carefully than they may hitherto have done. That is a responsibility of the House.

When the hon. Member for Stafford says that something else must be done he is identifying precisely the problem about which I have been speaking. This Bill will do nothing to stop incidents of the sort shown on "East Enders". It will have no impact on such incidents. To claim, as he appears to by implication, that the Bill will in some way do what he believes should be done is not seeing the content of the Bill and what it will achieve.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. Gentleman admitted that he is not able to see The Times at present. Can he say whether that is a matter of self-regulation or is he bowing to the dictates of censorship by his own party machine?

Mr. Smith: It is purely an act of choice on my part. As someone who only two evenings ago was standing with striking print workers outside the plant at Wapping to identify my support for their struggle, it is clearly a choice that I have made and would have made, whatever decision might have been made——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted further down that road. We must get back to the amendment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Smith : I will give way as long as we are not trespassing on Mr. Deputy Speaker's ruling.

Mr. Mitchell: We are not trespassing on it. I have an agreement with the News International reporters. They do not report a word I say, just like before.

I agree with the point that my hon. Friend is making about the Bill. I wonder whether he agrees with my point that this amendment is the nub of our problem. If the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) will accept this amendment, since I understand that he is to accept all the other amendments in order to get the Bill through, he can almost certainly have his Bill. This amendment is the sticking point for the Opposition. If the amendment is accepted the Bill is acceptable.

Mr. Smith: I am not sure that I would go along with my hon. Friend entirely. Although the amendment would improve the Bill it would still leave a number of defects. I might perhaps say in passing, had new clauses 1 and 2 been accepted for debate, and had the hon. Member for Davyhulme sought to include them within the Bill, that my attitude may conceivably have been different. However, I am afraid that that has not been possible.

I accept the motives of the hon. Member for Davyhulme. Even if the Bill does not reach the statute book he will have achieved a considerable amount by bringing issues before the House. Evidence of that can be found in the IBA's spring 1986 quarterly journal, Airwaves, which contains an article by Robin Duval, the chief assistant of television, who says:

"But all this activity is, at the least, a very healthy reminder that it would be a good idea to remind ourselves"— that is the IBA—

"and everybody else of just what it is we do about section

[Mr. Smith]

4(1)(a). We have had a few shocks recently and we are publicising our case. But perhaps we should do it not just now, but again. And again."

Mr. Duval is saying that the IBA has picked up from the activity around the Bill the message that there is concern and a need to examine carefully its own activities, not just now but in the future, on a regular basis. That is an achievement. That means that pressure is receiving a response.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): We have discussed the subject on a number of occasions over the past seven years. We can agree about the boards and governors and codes of conduct, but we are worried that productions do not always conform with the guidelines. The producers of programmes do not seem to conform to the guidelines. How are we to tackle that problem?

Mr. Smith: I am not sure that I agree with the hon. Gentleman. On the whole the guidelines are admirable. However, some areas are not covered in the guidelines. I glanced rapidly this morning through the IBA guidelines to see what they say about the taking of drugs and overdoses. That problem is not adequately covered in the guidelines and it might be sensible to draw that to the attention of the governors and the board.

The hon. Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) refers to the use of the guidelines by the producers. I had a long discussion only last week with a programme writer who made a programme which went out on 1 April. It was a spoof produced specifically for April fools' day. It was about Hitler's activities during the war. He told me that in making the programme he examined the guidelines closely because he was worried in case any material in the programme was offensive to anyone in the Jewish community in Britain. Having checked the guidelines, he amended his programme. The programme was then watched by high-level management in the broadcasting authority to check whether the guidelines were being observed. The guidelines are frequently operated in that way. It is a careful process and, on the whole, it seems to work effectively.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman recall the recent court case in which the Director General of the BBC, Mr. Bill Whitney and Mr. Shaw, who is now with the Independent Televison Contractors Association, were involved? They made it clear that it was extremely difficult for the line of command to which the hon. Gentleman is referring to produce the results that he would like to see the guidelines produce.

Will the hon. Gentleman also accept that the process of taking action under the Broadcasting Act to enforce the guidelines is ineffective because it involves judicial review under order 53, which no one can use to any significant extent? In other words, self-regulation does not work. Therefore, there is an obligation on Parliament to ensure that a criminal line is drawn at the bottom.

Mr. Smith: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman for a number of reasons, principally because the operation of the guidelines is inevitably a subjective process. There are guidelines on a number of sensitive issues on which clear-cut, black and white, easy decisions cannot be made. Difficult and delicate matters are involved and they vary according to the context of the programme and so on.

For example, the IBA has television programme guidelines on bad language. They say:

"There is no absolute ban on the use of bad language. But when used it must be defensible in terms of context and authenticity. It is one thing, for example, when such language occurs in a documentary programme, and quite another when it is introduced for its own sake in a studio production. Many people who would not be unduly shocked by swearing are offended when it is used to excess and without justification."

The key issues are the frequency of use and the context in which bad language is used. It is not easy to decide on such matters. It is difficult for a court or a judge, let alone for the DPP, to make such decisions. It is easier to make the decisions during the careful process of considering guidelines for overwhelmingly responsible programme making.

Imported broadcasting material must be considered under the guidelines, but there is a problem. Imported material is subject to the discredited Customs Consolidation Act 1876, which should be wiped off the statute book and be replaced by a new definition of obscene and indecent which relates to the definition for material produced in Britain. There are different standards, and there should be the same standard. I hope that the Government will consider legislation in the forthcoming Session to eliminate that absurd anomaly in the law, which increases the difficulty in the case of imported broadcast material or material intended for broadcasting. I am very sorry that my new clause designed to clear up that anomaly was not accepted.

If the clause is not amended, the major problem will be that the criminal law will effectively be brought into a field where at the moment we have the guidelines and the layers of responsibility that end ultimately with the governors of the BBC and the board of the IBA. The climate for producers and programme-makers will not be improved by that process.

A number of hon. Members have referred to letters that they have received from constituents. I have received more letters from constituents opposing the Bill than from people who are in favour of it. One of my constituents wrote to me in February, saying:

"I have five children of my own, all under 20. My wife and I regard the kind of society this . . . could lead to as more objectionable, in its intolerance, philistinism and authoritarianism, than the one it is designed to rescue them from. . . . No one in his senses wants children exposed to degrading representations of sex or, even more pictorially available, violence. . . . But this bizarre . . . bill simply won't do. It can be sure of years of tiresome and implacable resistance if it becomes law. If there is anything useful any of us can do at this late stage, please let us know."

That letter graphically illustrates the problem. There is undoubtedly public concern in this area. Although in Committee the hon. Member for Davyhulme admitted that there is no evidence at all of any problem connected with radio, there is a general concern that the impact of television and radio may be deleterious to children. However, I do not believe that the clause, unamended, is the way to protect children and to make those concerns known forcibly to the programme-makers. I do not believe that legal restraint is the way to deal with such difficult, complex and subjective issues. There should be pressure, but the clause, unamended, is not one that I can support.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Mikardo: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 10, leave out subsection (4).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in page 2, line 11, after 'article', insert

'which has been edited and is otherwise completed for transmission'.

Mr. Mikardo: Subsection (4) is very disturbing——

Mr. Churchill: Before the hon. Gentleman goes any further, may I say to those whose amendments have been selected for debate that I am willing to accept all the remaining amendments, including that of the hon. Gentleman.

1.15 pm

Mr. Mikardo: I am deighted to hear that. The effect of the hon. Gentleman's comments will be seriously to curtail the observations I was about to make. I do not now need to persuade the hon. Gentleman or the House of the validity of the amendment and of the dangers that lie within clause 2(4).

I would like, nevertheless, to say a word or two about something that may affect some subsequent amendments. The first line of clause 1(4) of the Bill, contains one of the 12 instances in the Bill in which the word "obscene" occurs. That word occurs in all the clauses in the Bill.

I would like to say a few words about that as I believe it will affect our attitude to the Bill, and perhaps relieve me of the obligation of making these points on Third Reading.

We all agree that the present law is defective in these matters, and the Bill is intended to amend the law. The evidence for the law being defective lies in the huge amount of litigation that the present law has occasioned. There have been a number of cause célèore trials which have aroused much feeling, which has cost an awful lot of money and which have taken up a great deal of time.

It was for that reason that I was absolutely delighted when I heard that the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) was bringing in a Bill to amend the present law. When I saw the Bill, I realised, as we have all realised, that his laundry list made the Bill very defective. Nevertheless, I had hoped that in the course of the Bill's proceedings, in Committee and on Report, we would manage to find a definition of "obscenity" which would enable us to amend the law in a sensible way.

I voted for the Second Reading on those grounds. I did not like the Bill as it was, but I thought that we should have the chance to amend it and perhaps have a good Bill in the end. The great problem with the present law, which has not been avoided but made worse by the Bill, is that we are required to put ourselves into someone else's mind and decide whether there is a tendency to deprave and corrupt somebody. A judge must therefore decide what went on in the mind of the reader of a book or of the viewer of a television film. It is never easy to put oneself into someone else's mind.

In one respect, obscenity is like beauty, it lies in the eye of the beholder. The line between prudery and prurience is very narrow and wobbly. We saw some evidence of that a few weeks ago when my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) moved a motion to introduce a Bill on a subject very much cognate with the Bill before us. On that occasion a number of Conservative Members behaved disgracefully and those hon. Members are supporters of today's Bill. They behaved in such a way as perfectly to illustrate the narrow boundary between prudery and prurience. They giggled in lascivious recall of what they had seen on page three of The Sun that morning. They reminded me very much—especially the hon. Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) and for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), and the hon. and highly temporary Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) — of a 12-year-old boy in class, lasciviously looking through his first batch of dirty pictures, peeping at them surreptitiously because they are interleaved in the pages of his algebra textbook. They were totally immature. These hon. Members support this Bill because they believe in a high moral tone, yet when my hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood introduced her Bill they behaved in almost a lecherous fashion.

We must now—I shall be brief in view of what the hon. Member for Davyhulme has said—ask ourselves whether we have managed in the Bill to put right the defect in the present law which arises from the fact that a person making a judgment is required to put himself into the mind of a different person. I am required at my age—most judges are nearer my age than that of most other hon. Members—to put myself in the mind of a child.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order for the hon. Member for Bowand Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) to address himself to the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am listening carefully to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). Nothing which he has said so far has been out of order.

Mr. Mikardo: I am obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am addressing myself to the key word, which is "obscene." I promise the hon. Member for Davyhulme that I shall not be long. If it is difficult for a judge to put himself into the mind of another adult, it is virtually impossible to put himself into the mind of a young teenager. I know that that is so. I find it difficult to understand the moves of my grandchildren and I sometimes find it difficult even to understand their language. The generation gap is widening all the time, and when it is a double generation gap it is extremely wide.

I do not know what will tend to deprave and corrupt a 15-year-old. I do know that many 12, 14 or 15-year-olds know a great deal more about life than I did when I was 12, 14 or 15 years old. The attitudes of young people these days are different from those which obtained when I was young. Young people are very informed and they receive a wider education in many areas than we did. They read much more widely and the situation is entirely different now from what it was previously.

We are not living in a Victorian world although there is much talk these days about returning to Victorian values. It should be understood that there was far more prurience in Victorian times than there is now. The mixture of prudery and prurience in Victorian times is illustrated by the fact that they put cloth round the legs of grand pianos because they thought that the legs could deprave and corrupt. What rubbish it all was.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Davyhulme for his willingness to accept the amendment. With all respect to him, I think that the Bill still remains gravely defective. I do not blame him for not having found the magic formula which would make good law instead of the present law. One day there may be Members of this place who are cleverer than we are—things may become easier with a change in the climate of the times 10 or 15 years hence—and the stage may be reached when we can make an improving amendment to the present law. To my deep regret, I do not think that the Bill is an improvement.

In view of the observations of the hon. Member for Davyhulme, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. Member telling me that he is not moving the amendment?

Mr. Mikardo: I cannot tell you that, because I have moved it, but I also observe that the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) is seeking to speak and I do not want to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Greg Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said that he was prepared to accept all the amendments on the Order Paper which were to be called. I wonder whether the House could receive some clarification from my hon. Friend regarding what he has said. With regard to this bunch of amendments, the amendment which has just been moved seeks to omit subsection (4) from the Bill and the amendment in my name, amendment No. 5, seeks to amend subsection (4). What is my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme actually offering the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Member for Davyhulme would like to clarify the position?

Mr. Churchill: When I said that I was prepared to accept all the amendments that had been selected, the effect of accepting amendment No. 4 would mean that amendment No. 5 would fall.

Mr. Mikardo: Further to that point of order, I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker and to the House. I was in error. The hon. Member for Davyhulme cannot accept the amendment unless it has been moved and he cannot accept it if it is withdrawn. Therefore I was wrong in suggesting that I should seek leave to withdraw the amendment. If there are hon. Members who wish to speak I do not wish to interfere.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In case the House is confused, we have now reached the position where amendment No. 4 has been moved and we are therefore discussing amendment No. 4 together with amendment No. 5, and if any hon. Members rise I shall call them.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Thank you for the clarification. However, I still have a problem because I do not understand the distinction. Amendment No. 4 leaves out subsection (4) but amendment No. 5, which will presumably be selected and will presumably be moved if we are to discuss it, leaves out a part of the subsection. I still do not understand what we are actually leaving out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is a well-known procedure in the House. The discussion is taking place on amendment No. 4. We are discussing amendment No. 5 with that. It is perfectly in order to discuss both of them in this debate. When the debate concludes I will, of course, put the Question on amendment No. 4, which is the substantive amendment being discussed. The House will then have an opportunity to come to a conclusion on that, unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. Brinton: I will console my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) by being brief. I rise, if I have understood the technicalities correctly, to speak in favour of amendment No. 4 which my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme has already accepted, so I will withdraw my own amendment. It is my understanding of subsection (4) that anyone found in possession of what is defined in the Bill as an "obscene article" would be assumed to have it in his or her possession for gain. That needed clearer definition hence my amendment No. 5.

The editor has to edit the film and the cameraman has to shoot it, but if either of them are found to be in possession of the shots that went the wrong way at the wrong time, they could be found to be in possession of film or tape for gain.

Gain poses another problem. As far as I am aware, the BBC does not try to make a profit out of its normal operations in Britain—it uses licence payers' money. Who is considered to gain? I can understand the idea if any individual uses material for criminal gain on the black market, but will the staff producer or staff cameraman on a salary be considered to gain? I could have hoped that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme would have defined more clearly who is responsible.

1.30 pm

Mr. Mikardo: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but there is an even worse element. Clause 1(4) weakens, if it does not break, the principle that a person is presumed innocent until proven guilty. There is such a thing as an offence of possessing goods knowing them to have been stolen. If anybody proposed that the law should provide that anybody who possesses stolen goods should be presumed to know that they have been stolen, every lawyer in the country would scream his head off in protest.

Mr. Brinton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I was about to argue that point, but will no longer do so as he has put it much more fluently than I could. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme will realise that there should have been a definition of who is responsible. It might be the governors of the BBC, the members of the IBA or the director-general.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I want to speak to the amendment, not to bury it—which seems to have been the original assumption—but to praise it. I am still puzzled about the distinction between amendment No. 4 and amendment No. 5 and the effect on the Obscene Publications Act 1959, as amendment No. 5 would appear to narrow the scope more satisfactorily.

Mr. Brinton: I have been a bit confused by the procedure, but my understanding is that, if amendment No. 4 is accepted, amendment No. 5 will fall. I rashly said that I proposed to withdraw my amendment. Perhaps I had better wait and see as the debate might change hon. Member's minds and my amendment might be accepted.

Mr. Mitchell rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can help with the procedural point. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) is right. If amendment No. 4 is agreed to, amendment No. 5 falls, but if amendment No. 4 is not agreed to and the hon. Gentleman wishes the House to make a decision on amendent No. 5, I shall be preapred to allow a Division on it.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That clarifies matters in regard to the withdrawal or pursuance of the amendment. I should now like to ask about the effect on the Obscene Publications Act 1959. By defeating amendment No. 1, the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has made the Bill unacceptable to me. I support the Bill in practice and principle, but I cannot accept the interference with broadcasting institutions that is implicit in clause 1. Our amendment was a satisfactory way of dealing with that problem, by removing the broadcasting organisations—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now harking back to an amendment that has already been dealt with. He must deal with this amendment, which is concerned with publication for gain.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is absolutely correct. However, the failure of the amendment means that the Bill is now unacceptable. I wanted to support the Bill, but because of the failure of that amendment I am now unable to do so.

Subsection (4) demonstrates the difficulties involved in interfering with the broadcasting institutions by means of legislation. Who is to say at what point the interference shall stop, or at what point the material becomes ready for transmission, or at what point it becomes subject to control? The broadcasting organisations have in their possession parts of programmes that might be considered to be obscene but which form a contributory element to the overall programme. They are there as part of the editing and stitching together of a programme in the process of building it up. However, part of that material could be regarded as obscene.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that unless subsection (4) is removed from clause 1 the whole purpose of the Bill is likely to be negated? In the very act of looking at what might be deemed to be obscene and indecent, the programme producer is bound to have in his or her possession material that he or she is considering. The object of the Bill is to encourage that process.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend, who is correct. However, my point is that the fact that subsection (4) ought to have been included in the Bill illustrates the extreme difficulty about legislating to remove the television and broadcasting exemption. When that principle is accepted, which is what the Bill does, it is difficult to know at what point the interference will stop and at what point it will begin.

I recall examples of such material. They were not included in the nightly magazine type of programme with which I was concerned. That material was suitable and, indeed, compulsory for family viewing in Yorkshire. It was an extremely important and entertaining current affairs programme. However, material for other programmes that were intended to be broadcast late at night could, at different stages of its production, have been regarded as obscene. Had this clause not been removed it would have made the assembly of such a programme extremely difficult. That illustrates the difficulty of legislating to cover broadcasting material.

What will be the effect of removing this subsection upon the existing legislation? I presume that we shall return to the status quo ante and that the Obscene Publications Act 1959 will apply. We shall have to consider at what stage the broadcasting exemption is to be applied. Somebody who makes a programme for transmission is making it for gain. The gain may be to the cameraman, whose wages will be paid, or the independent producer may gain, in the sense that his contract may depend upon the programme. Under the obscene publications legislation, the possession of obscene material for gain is an offence.

[Mr. Mitchell]

We have to ask at what stage the broadcasting exemption will be introduced if this subsection is removed. One therefore has to consider whether the definition that is included in amendment No. 5 will deal with this problem more satisfactorily than the removal of the subsection, which is the intention of amendment No. 4. It is important that the Minister should tell us the effect of removing that subsection.

Mr. Brinton: Perhaps the amendment is too indirect and I should have written it more carefully. I was trying to achieve the position that once a programme has been edited, is ready for transmission and has become in every sense the property of the BBC or the programme company, the poor old DPP will know exactly who to go for, whereas earlier the BBC or programme company might be able to deny responsibility.

Mr. Mitchell: That makes the point clear and I can accept that. He is saying that the exemption of broadcasting material from the Obscene Publications Act 1959 becomes effective at the point when an edited programme is ready for transmission. That is a clear and satisfactory definition which is workable.

The problem is what happens to the material before that. We are now making that material subject to the Obscene Publications Act 1959. We all know that putting together a television programme is in some senses like building a Meccano—there is a collection of bits to put together. Those bits, some of them individually, could be indecent or obscene and all of them have been produced for gain in the sense that the people employed on them are either paid wages to produce them or are working on a contract to produce them and so make a gain from the production of that material. Therefore, they come under the 1959 Act. Any one bit, construed on its own could be indecent. Each is part of an entity which must be judged as a whole rather than in bits, but possession of the particular bits creates a danger. That is the difficulty in which we find ourselves as soon as we start trying to extend the legislation in this kind of way. Problems are created for the individual possessing particular bits.

I hope that the Minister will be able to set my mind at rest on that. I would rather not be in this position. I would rather not have extended the legislation to broadcasting and television but that is what we have decided to do and that is the position that we must now face.

I can remember people working in television who have taken material home or have put it out to production units, and where a programme has been put together bit by bit, Indeed, I can remember occasions where particularlysalubrious bits have been strung together in a Christmas film at which everybody giggles, nudges and winks and which is a great social occasion and a bit of fun. Nothing is seriously intended for publication but the material has been produced for gain, and is part—perhaps a discarded part—of a programme which needs to be viewed as a whole.

What happens to such material and what happens to the material which is used in the programme in its incomplete state? What happens in the labs and in the editing? What happens if any pieces are taken out of the studio by those working on the programme? What happens if material is sent out to an independent unit? Large numbers of editors up and down the country are working on material under their own steam at home, using their own video facilities. They may have facilities built on to the house. What will happen to them and the material under the Bill? That is the nightmare which we are facing.

Mr. Brinton: The hon. Gentleman has forced out of me an admission that I had hoped to withold. In 1962 I was the first newscaster on television to be seen nude fully frontal on the screen. That happened on a recorded programme before the days of editing. I was doing a programme about Turkish baths, the logical end to which was that I whipped off my towel, jumped into the pool and swam across. The programme's director promised me faithfully that he would cut from camera one to camera two at the appropriate moment. His finger slipped, he was a little late and there I was for a second or so in all my splendour. Had my hon. Friend's Bill or any sort of Bill against nudity been in operation I might have been sued, the director might have been sued or, should it have been the managing director of the company? That is the problem.

1.45 pm

Mr. Mitchell: I suppose it depends upon whether that was regarded as a news flash or a shock horror probe. If the material is rescreened, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not ask me to endorse it publicly in the way in which so many of his colleagues endorsed the nudes in The Sun recently. That illustrates the problem.

I have featured in Christmas films in the intimacy and privacy of the BBC or ITV studios in which material has been put together, much of it harmless, to make it humorous and, in some cases it was indecent. All of that material has been produced for gain, I submit, under the definition of the Obscene Publications Act 1959.

Mr. Dickens: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the rug has been pulled out from under his feet and from under the feet of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton)—two hon. Members who have had close connections with the television industry for most of their lives—when the sponsor of the Bill has accepted every amendment tabled thus far through to the end of the debate? Now, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby is struggling and throwing foolish reasons forward. Judges and jurors are sensible people. They can decide where the blame for material lies and if it is inadvertently put into the wrong hands. Do you accept that he has been embarrassed and that he is now clutching at straws to try to sink the Bill which has satisfied every amendment thus far?

Mr. Mitchell: I am sure that you are not struggling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not struggling. I can see that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth is struggling to reconcile his endorsement of nudes on page three of The Sun with his stand on other matters of public decency. I wonder what position his constituency party took on that endorsement.

Mr. Hayes: I hesitate to disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth. However, I prosecute and defend obscene publications cases—I have probably seen more pornographic films than most hon. Members—and I do not think that I am depraved or corrupted. One of the reasons why the Obscene Publications Act 1959 has failed is that jurors differ from county to county and from court to court. That is one of the difficulties, and often jurors are not the best people to decide. There is no consistency.

Mr. Mitchell: That is exactly the point I am making. There is no consistency. When one accepts the general principle of interference, one opens up a Pandora's box which it is difficult to regulate or control because the pattern becomes haphazard.

As for having the rug pulled from under me, my understanding of the speech of the hon. Member for Gravesham is that the rug was pulled from off him. I do not accept that the rug has been pulled from under me. I made clear my support for the general principle of this Bill. I cannot accept the interference in the broadcasting organisations and in the principle of self-discipline and self regulation, which is implicit. I asked the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) to withdraw amendment No. 1 and the rest of the Bill could go through without any particular problems. He did not do so. We are left with a Bill, the centre and dangerous part of which, is to allow interference in broadcasting institutions. The rest of the amendments to the Bill are acceptable and satisfactory. I am prepared to support them and there is strong public demand for them. However, under the guise of concern about violence we are creating a situation of unpredictable interference in the broadcasting organisations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is again harping back to a previous amendment. We must talk about subsection (4), which relates to publications for gain.

Mr. Mitchell: I apologise. That is correct and I am sorry that I was drawn to that area. I have to explain my position.

Subsection (4) is straightforward. What are we opening up by removing the section? Once we accept the principle of interference, what scope will be left for inference with the broadcasting organisations, not just on the general principle of the programmes but on bits of the programmes before they are put together? Is this an attempt to hamstring the broadcasting organisations by acting on particular sections of programmes because they can be construed as coming within the context of the Obscene Publications Act 1959?

Those bits might be intended for a different whole, but as bits they might be indecent or obscene because they have been created for gain. Gain is implicit in the making of a programme.

It is wrong of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth to get up in a flush of moral indignation and denounce me for expressing a realistic anxiety. We must be rational about legislation. It is no use making emotional gestures and rushing into spasms of activity. Our job is to use our reason, to evaluate legislation and to ask whether it is the most effective way of dealing with a problem.

I think that the measure is inadequate and fails in this instance. I am right to express my concern, I hope that the Minister can set our minds at rest and tell us what will happen to bits under the 1959 legislation.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) in his intervention seemed to say that by the sweeping acceptance by the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) of all the amendments, the House has been relieved of a problem. It has not. Accepting the amendments in such a rush is proof of the problems that the legislation presents. The hon. Gentleman has said that he wishes to accept amendment No. 4, tabled by my hon. Friends and that, automatically, amendment No. 5, tabled by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton), will fall as a consequence.

I have considered the two amendments carefully and in spite of all the respect that I have for my hon. Friends I believe that amendment No. 5 addresses itself better to the problem than amendment No. 4. I am faced with a considerable problem.

The key principle with which the amendments attempt to deal is whether a programme maker, when assembling the bits of a programme, will be liable under the Obscene Publications Act for the content of all those bits, whether or not they are to be shown on public television. It cannot be right that a programme-maker when putting together a programme, when assessing all the bits of footage shot for that programme and when examining archive material, should be liable under the Obscene Publications Act. It cannot be right that he should be liable for every single bit in his possession, even if it is not to be shown. The principle is clear. The measure should cover only items which are actually shown or on the point of being shown on television. That seems to be the fair way.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I cannot understand my hon. Friend's reasoning. Why should that be the point at which material becomes immune? The component parts are as important as the whole and the threat to broadcasting can come from attempts to prosecute before the parts become a coherent, developed programme. Is not there a threat to the material before it is assembled?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend misunderstands me. My anxiety is that in the putting together of all the parts of the programme, the programme maker should have as wide a range of material as possible available to him. The material that he is considering should not automatically be liable for action under the Obscene Publications Act. Only when the material has been put together and is about to be shown should such considerations arise.

The removal of subsection (4) would leave us with subsection (5) which refers to publication of material that "was to take place in the course of a television or sound broadcast".
That presents the same problems as subsection (4). That is why I prefer amendment No. 5, which makes it clear that articles for broadcast that are to be subject to the Obscene Publications Act should be those that have been edited and are complete for transmission.

Inadequate as subsection (4) is, its removal will still leave us with a problem, because of the wording of subsection (5). However, if subsection (4) were amended by amendment No. 5 the intention of the House would be made clear.

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman is making heavy weather of this point. I hope that he will accept the offer of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) to accept amendment No. 4. Subsection (5) says:

"Proceedings . . . shall not be instituted except by and with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions" and it refers to publication that "was to take place in the course of a television or sound broadcast".

[Mr. Greg Knight]

Therefore, could not it be validly argued that an unedited film was not "to take place in the course of a television . . . broadcast" because some scenes would be edited out?

Mr. Smith: The problem lies in being able to prove such matters to the court or to the Director of Public Prosecutions. The burden of proof placed on the programme makers would be considerable. That is why I think that amendment No. 5 would be preferable to the deletion of subsection (4). I must therefore express my concern at the way in which the hon. Member for Davyhulme has simply grasped at one amendment, although the other, which would be preferable, would be effectively ruled out of consideration if it were accepted.

2 pm

Mr. Mellor: I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) a slight sensation that rather heavy weather was made of the amendment in the Mutt and Jeff act between the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). Frankly, not much turns on subsection (4), and I am not sure that we should get very excited about whether it is included in the Bill. It states only that someone "who has an obscene article in his ownership, possession or control with a view to its being shown"

shall be deemed to have that article for publication or gain.

If the subsection is removed, the fact that he has that article in his possession for publication or gain will have to be proved; it will not be assumed.

I am well aware that parts of the 1959 Act have caused difficulties and are much criticised. However, there is a similar provision in the 1959 Act in relation to books, magazines and cinematograph film, and it has not caused any difficulty. Perhaps a somewhat disingenuous attempt is being made to hoist my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) on Morton's fork. He thought that it would be sensible to include subsection (4) on the basis that it reproduces for television the precise provisions of the 1959 Act that already apply elsewhere. He was told by those who seem to want to stop the progress of the Bill that he should remove subsection (4). Having agreed with them, he is then criticised for doing so. For whatever reasons people may oppose the Bill, no one believes that much turns on subsection (4), because it does not.

Mr. Dubs: The Minister's brief speech has not clarified matters. I have one or two doubts about what he has said. At this late stage in the debate, we owe it to ourselves and those whom we represent to be clear about what the amendment will do. When I first read subsection (4), I thought that what it sought to do was to overcome a defect which is in the Bill but not in the guidelines, and catch people at an early stage before an item has been shown. The danger of the Obscene Publications Act is that it tends to catch people retrospectively. I understood that subsection (4) was intended to overcome that and to ensure that if there was any belief that an obscene film or obscene footage for a film was in the possession of a television company, that would be an offence. Action could then be taken before the film was shown.

That was a worthy aim, but it seemed to me that the consequences of the measure might extend well beyond that simple intention. I have therefore listened carefully to the relative merits of amendments Nos. 4 and 5 in order to decide which of the two was more satisfactory. I am not very knowledgable about how television companies work, but I believe that there may be dangers in holding them liable to have committed a criminal offence when the procedures and the safeguards within the television company have not yet been brought into play. As the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) has said, they might inadvertently have some footage that could be deemed to be obscene and which the television contractors, if not the producers or the authority, would not have allowed to be shown. However, it might be possible for someone to be found guilty before those procedures and safeguards had been implemented—or at least for them to be brought to court. That is a difficulty and that is why the deletion of subsection (4) might be the sensible way to prevent this happening.

The parallel with printed material is not a good one, and that is because of the complexities of the procedures within television companies, for which there is no equivalent in the case of publication of a book, where there are only two decision-makers, the author and the publisher. With television material there might be several sets of decision-makers. In the earlier debate, I said that the IBA had prevented the showing of certain films and on that point I shall turn to the possible effect of section 5. Let us suppose that the IBA is considering the showing of a feature film which has come to the IBA with a view to it being shown. I suspect this means it would come within the provisions of amendment No. 5 because it would have been edited and ready for transmission. At that point the IBA would still be about to go through the stage of looking at the film to see whether it was suitable.

Mr. Brinton: My view is that amendment No. 5 could be invoked, but it is much more interesting to cast one's eyes ahead to amendment No. 7. It covers the position about feature films.

Mr. Dubs: I thank the hon. Gentleman for clarifying that point. At any rate those are my reasons for thinking that the inclusion of subsection (4) in its entireity poses undersirable dangers and is unnecessary. In relation to subsections (4) and (5) I am not totally convinced either way. Either of them would be acceptable and preferable to leaving subsection (4) in as it stands.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Greg Knight: I beg to move, Amendment No. 7, in page 3, line 6 at end insert—

'(7A) No order for the forfeiture of the said article shall be made if the owner can show that the said article is capable of being shown, played or broadcast in an edited form with the offending scene or scenes removed.'.

In the light of the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) I intend to be brief. I am pleased that my hon. Friend has given an undertaking to the House that he is prepared to accept this amendment. The essence of the amendment is to limit forfeiture and some of the points that I had proposed to make were made in the previous debate. Film can be edited but obscene magazines can not.

My next point is that even if a film, when edited, is obscene, if the obscenity is not the central theme but is incidental to the film why should the whole article be forfeited? Why should we not allow those in possession of the film to use an edited version that is still a saleable product? If the obscenity takes up 10 minutes and the running time of the film is perhaps one to one and a half hours, it is reasonable to allow that film to be retained and not to be forfeited. I am grateful that my hon. Friend has accepted that. The earlier point made by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) is valid here. If, for example, the BBC buys a film for broadcasting and decides that some scenes in the film are not suitable for transmission, I should not like to see the BBC having to forfeit that film even though no scenes of obscenity were to be broadcast.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I doubt whether this threat can be used as a means of forcing re-editing or censorship of existing films. If the amendment is accepted does the hon. Gentleman see a possibility of it being used in that way?

Mr. Knight: No. I see the amendment only as a limit on the right of forfeiture. That is all that it is intended to be. It would prevent films from being seized that could be re-edited, or that are perhaps intended to be re-edited before being shown to the public.

With those brief comments, I commend the amendment to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2

SPECIAL TEST OF OBSCENITY IN RELATION TO PERSONS UNDER THE AGE OF 18

Mr. Dubs: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 3, line 17, leave out '18' and insert '16'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 15, in page 3, line 32, leave out '18' and insert '16'.

No. 16, in page 3, line 40, leave out '18' and insert '16'.

No. 17, in page 3, line 42, at end add

'; except that this provision shall not apply in circumstances where the visibility or access is available solely by reason of a person's employment at a place of publication.'.

No. 18, in page 4, line 2, leave out '18' and insert '16'.

No. 24, in title, line 4, leave out '18' and insert '16'.

Mr. Dubs: All the amendments seek to make one change to clause 2. We wish to change the age of 18 to 16 throughout. Of course, clause 2 deals with printed material and specifically with pictures. Its intention is to have a more rigorous test for those age under 18 for material that might be obscene or that might have a tendency to deprave or corrupt. A difficulty arises if the cut-off comes at the age of 18, because a jury would have to look differently at material seen by those aged under 18. It is particularly difficult to draw the line at the age of 18. We would all be very reluctant to allow children to see certain printed material and pictures, but the maturity of teenagers and the responsibilities that come to them both legally and in fact from the age of 16 onwards, make it difficult for any jury to decide that some material is unsuitable for viewing by those aged under 18 — for example, by a 17-year-old—but all right for those aged 18 or over. If I was a juror and had to make that decision, I would not know how to react.

Of course, there is some material that should not be published, but we are talking about material that is deemed to be all right for adults but not for children. If the cut-off line was drawn at the age of 16, it would be much more sensible.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman had a simple argument to put. Now that he has put it, will he be good enough to allow us to proceed with the rest of the Bill?

Mr. Dubs: I have been on my feet for only two or two and a half minutes. It is not always obvious that I have been so quickly persuasive as the hon. Gentleman now suggests.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Unlike the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), I cannot follow the logic of the argument. If a jury was asked to assess the effects of such material on a juvenile, it would have to undertake a mind-boggling feat of imagination that would be difficult for any jury, whether the age involved was 15, 16, 17 or 18. Is it not more logical to accept the conventional age of majority, 18, and to say that adulthood begins there? I see no point in splitting hairs or in lowering the age to 16 or 17. What is the logic in inserting the age of 16, when we all now know that the age of majority is 18?

Mr. Dubs: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but I do not agree with it. Ultimately, one must take a subjective view of the issue. If I had to serve on a jury, I would find it almost impossible to draw any distinction between the suitability of material for 18-year-olds and the suitability of material for 17-year-olds. The younger the age at which one has to make the distinction, the easier, in some ways, it becomes. That is the purpose of the amendment. After all, the age of consent for heterosexual behaviour is 16. That assumes a certain maturity, and I am applying that criterion to this set of amendments. That is why, on balance—it is a difficult balance to draw—I prefer the age of 16 for the purposes of clause 2

Ms. Clare Short: I support these amendments for the simple reason that it is crazy to allow people to marry at 16 but to prevent them from buying at their local newsagents whatever porny magazines we unfortunately produce in this country.

I have very little patience for the Bill or for those who support it. I do not believe that it will deal with the major problem in society which is worrying people. The Bill's first clause, applying the Obscene Publications Act 1959 to television, will not do much to change anything broadcast on television. It will simply create great uncertainty for the makers of television programmes. We all know that things that are found to be obscene are so extreme that nothing produced on television would be caught within that definition.

The second part of the Bill provides that if porny magazines are supplied, if the amendment is accepted, to anyone under 16, or displayed in a place to which under 16-year-olds have access, there will be a test as to whether these magazines will deprave or corrupt an under 16-year-old.

The likely effect of that is that the porny magazines that are displayed in newsagents will be put in packages. I believe that that would be welcomed, but it is a minor thing. In the meantime, every day of every week, of every year, more than 10 million pictures of naked women deliberately posed in sexually provocative ways are circulated up and down the land to men, women and children. These pictures are seen by at least double that number of adults and by many children. They have a really damaging effect on the population. That is the view of thousands of women.

[Ms. Clare Short]

The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said that he had received nearly 1,000 letters. I have received 3,052 letters and messages of support. Of those, 2,000 were from women and 1,000 from what I would call decent men. Of these letters, 1,241 came from a wide range of organisations — Tory organisations, church organisations, Labour party organisations and trade unions. Spontaneous petitions were collected in towns, cities and villages by women, and these were often supported by men.

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Ms. Short: These petitions were supported by men. I shall give way briefly to my hon. Friend, but I wish to complete my point.

Mr. Mitchell: I would like to inquire whether I would come within my hon. Friend's category of decent men? My hon. Friend might like to know that one Conservative Member who did express support for the page 3 girls was criticised by a group of Conservative associations. That was the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I realise that the hon. Lady is completing her preamble, but we must deal with the amendment. It covers a fairly narrow point — whether the age should be 18 or 16.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have been named by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). Whatever views I might have about The Sun newspaper, which I deplore the hon. Gentleman bringing into this debate——

Mr. Mitchell: I bet you do.

Mr. Dickens: —I would like you to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that The Sun newspaper——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed both the hon. Gentlemen to get that matter off their chests. We must now return to the amendments.

Ms. Short: I am discussing the effect of the amendment and what it will allow under 16 year olds to see or prevent them seeing, and what will be and what will not be prosecuted. That is a very important consideration of the Bill as amended.

I received a little more than 50 letters of opposition, 36 of which were obscene. These letters were interestingly obscene in that they followed a pattern. They tended to say "Get lost with your silly proposal," or "You only want to get rid of page 3 because you are jealous".

Mr. Deputy Speaker : Order. The hon. Lady must be fair to the House and to the sponsor of the amendment. She must not discuss another Bill. She must discuss the Bill under consideration and the amendment.

Ms. Short: I shall explain the way in which I am seeking to discuss the amendment, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am trying to discuss what the amended Bill will provide and what will be allowed to be circulated to those under 16 years of age and what will not. I believe strongly that the distortion of attitudes towards women and towards sex throughout society stems from the mass circulation of pictures of naked women posed deliberately in provocative ways. These pictures are circulated in schools and in homes and are commonly to be found on kitchen tables, for example. The problem is glaring and massive. Conservative Members claim to support the Bill, a measure that will have only a marginal effect if it is enacted, yet they are opposed to what I am trying to do. I asked the Government Chief Whip not to oppose my proposal and I received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) to pay attention to what I am saying. She is being unfair to the House. The amendment before us is a narrow one and the hon. Lady is trying to discuss another Bill, which is grossly out of order. I ask the hon. Lady to take notice of what I am saying.

Ms. Short: Of course I take notice of what you are saying, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You are saying that I must discuss the Bill that is before the House.

Mr. Dickens: The amendment.

Ms. Short: Very well, the amendment to the Bill. The clause provides that certain kinds of porny material cannot be supplied to young people. If the amendment is agreed to, it will be illegal to supply this material to those under 16 years of age, or made available in places where they can obtain it. If it is made available, the test of whether it is obscene will be whether it is likely to deprave and corrupt those under 16 years rather than adults.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that much of the material about which she is speaking is available through daily newspapers with mass circulations to those who are between 16 and 18 years of age, to which the amendment specifically relates?

Ms. Short: I agree with my hon. Friend. Surely it is in order to say that the ill that the clause is trying to remedy will not be dealt with fully by the clause as amended. Surely I can argue that the amendment will improve the clause. I have sat in my place since this morning because I wanted to comment on this part of the Bill. I had views on the earlier amendments but I did not intervene because I felt more strongly about the latter part of the Bill and did not want to take the time of the House by making constant speeches. I am now attempting to make a serious contribution and I am not trying to detain the House. I intend to conclude my remarks before 2.30 pm. Bearing in mind the sort of speeches that have been made, it is surely reasonable for me to ask to be allowed to make my speech.

The Bill's approach, and especially that of the clause, even as amended, is mistaken. There is a problem throughout the country, and women especially are agreed that it exists. There is a decadent attitude to sexuality that is spreading and growing. It is fed by the soft porn that appears in newspapers, which are distributed throughout the country. The definition of "deprave and corrupt" is a bad one. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have said that the present obscene publications law does not work well. If we add to it through the Bill, it is still not likely to work well. We need to move in another direction. We must move against material that degrades women and human sexuality. That might be a healthier concept.

The Bill will make no difference to the obscenity law. It is not good enough for the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) to say that there is a problem, that people are worried about the mounting tide of sexual crime, that we must do something about it and so we shall agree to any inefficient piece of legislation that is introduced and throw it at the problem to try to pretend to the public that the problem is being dealt with. That is how I see the Bill and the provisions contained within it.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme was not prepared to act on the mass circulation of pictures of naked women in newspapers. It makes me——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Ladywood was back on track until a moment ago. I invite her to return to the amendment.

Ms. Short: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of those who write to Members of Parliament are far more concerned about the degradation of women in popular newspapers, which make a great deal of money from so doing, than about other issues that have been raised by the hon. Member for Davyhulme?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. Lady will not be tempted to answer that. It is not in order on this amendment.

Ms. Short: My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North makes his own point and I agree with him. As it is out of order I shall not go down that road.

I asked the hon. Member for Davyhulme to incorporate in the Bill my concern about women's degradation—it is a fight I have been trying to wage—but the hon. Member refused to do so. Many Conservative Members who support the Bill have refused to embrace this issue. We are left with a fairly useless Bill which does not deal with the major problems which we face and, indeed, it looks as if the Bill will not be passed. That is regrettable.

Mr. Churchill: I am obliged to the hon. Lady. I understand her strength of feeling and her grounds for concern. What I find difficult is that, on one hand, the hon. Lady wishes to deal with a much milder form of offensiveness, namely, female nudity, but is not prepared to vote against the explicit pornographic magazines which are made readily available to children and young persons.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. I support clause 2, as amended. I regret that the hon. Gentleman did not take the opportunity of his success in the ballot to deal with the most glaring problem, which is distorting attitudes in society. Instead, he has acted against pornographic magazines which are seen by only a small proportion of the population. However, I did support clause 2, as amended.

I have been unable to say all that I wanted to say today. I had hoped that we would reach the Third Reading and then I would have been able to make the speech I had intended to make. Today, the hon. Member for Davyhulme and many of his colleagues have been exposed by the contrary positions they have taken on of the issues in the Bill. They claim to be against pornography and obscenity, yet they will not act against the worst element of it in our society. That is regrettable and it is regrettable that the hon. Member for Davyhulme did not introduce a better Bill.

Mr. Mikardo: My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) was in error in one respect when he moved the amendment. My hon. Friend said that amendment No. 12 and the other amendments in the group are concerned with the reduction of the relevant age from 18 years to 16 years. That is not quite right.

Amendment No. 17 makes a separate point. The clause as it stands provides that if a picture available is in a place where a young person may be which may deprave or corrupt that young person, an offence is committed. In general, I agree with that. Amendment No. 17 has become less important with the change from 18 years to 16 years. Many 16 and 17-year-olds may have left school and be working in places where such pictures are available.

It would be absolutely wrong for anybody to be guilty of an offence merely because such a picture is available, not for the purpose of selling it to young people, but because the young person was around that place in the course of his employment. It is true that, by reducing the age to 16, we have cut out the 16 and 17-year-olds working in a particular place.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just received a voting list and would like your guidance. The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) and the Leader of the Opposition have joined in the filibustering on this Bill, which seeks to protect children. Last week, they were both telling the House that Sunday trading——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dickens: Can I finish my point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What is the point of order?

Mr. Dickens: Last week they were telling the House that the shops issue was the greatest moral issue that the country had known.

Mr. Mikardo: You know very well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that is not a point of order. It was not relevant to the discussion but, apart from that, it was a very good intervention.

Mr. Churchill rose in his place, and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—
The House proceeded to a Division:

Mr. Chris Smith (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Chair to accept a closure motion after only a limited debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes. I have accepted the closure motion and the House is now coming to a decision on it.

Ms. Clare Short (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to clarify what we are voting on. I understand that we are voting on whether to end discussion on this group of amendments and that, if we do, we will move on to the next group.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Greenway (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you clarify the Bill's future following this Division and any later one? Am I not right in thinking that it will return to the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot anticipate that. We are voting on the closure. If the motion is carried, we shall proceed at once to a conclusion on the amendment under discussion.

Mr. Greenway (seated and covered): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The House having divided: Ayes 79, Noes 11.
